CITY HAMPERS DRYS IN ENFORCING LAW, DR. DORAN CHARGES

Commissioner Hints at Collusion Between the Police and Lawless Element.

WRITTEN "TIPS" IGNORED

Police Make No Effort to Invoke the Nuisance Law, He Says in Monograph.

LACK OF STATE LAW CITED

It Is Made an Excuse for Non-Enforcement, He Asserts—Federal Courts Clogged.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 31.—Prohibition Commissioner Doran, in a monograph on "State Cooperation" made public today, made the flat charge that there was a tendency on the part of New York City officials to hamper Federal enforcement of the prohibition laws "in many obscure ways."

He also asserted that well organized bands of law violators of all sorts in the city made the situation more difficult and that "it is not only the prohibition law that is not enforced." In the course of his attack upon the New York City Government, he agreed, however, that a strong sentiment against the prohibition law on the part of a large minority contributed to the lack of enforcement.

Dr. Doran picked out New York State, and particularly New York City, as an outstanding example of what might be expected to occur when cooperation was withheld from the Federal Government by the State and City Governments.

In criticizing the New York City officials, Dr. Doran asserted that in no other city are there found so many forces opposed to law enforcement.

Dr. Doran said that occasionally there would be "an outburst of raiding by the New York police," which would throw several hundred cases into the Federal courts and swamp them "beyond hope of accomplishment."

When Federal District Attorneys accepted pleas of guilty and fines in an effort to keep the dockets clean, he added, the city police took the position that they had done their part and that the Federal officials had failed to follow up the good work.

Such an attitude on the part of the police he characterized as "a manifestly unfair criticism," as every case, he said, could have been handled under the nuisance section of the penal code if the City Government had so desired.

Bureau Gets Complaints.

He added that daily many complaints came to the New York Federal prohibition administrator's office of liquor law violations, and that most of these had first been called to the attention of the police and nothing had been done to relieve the situation. He gave samples of some of these complaints.

"The situation in the larger cities of New York State, like Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, Utica and Albany," Dr. Doran said, "probably was somewhat better than in New York City," but he added that "the same forces in opposition to law enforcement are apparent in all of the larger cities of New York State."

Dr. Doran referred to the Mullan-Gage State enforcement law passed in 1921, and repealed in 1923, as a "model of clear, comprehensive and far-reaching legislation," and placed a large share of the blame for conditions in New York City and State on the fact that this law had been repealed.

New York City "Not Typical."

In that part of his monograph dealing with New York Dr. Doran said:

"The city has a population of about 6,000,000. It has a police force of 17,763 as of June, 1929. Enforcement conditions in the city are not typical. They are extraordinary.

"No other city in the country has so many varied problems. In no other city are there so many forces opposed to law enforcement. Nowhere else are these forces so sharply defined, so easily understood and so hard to combat.

"Lack of enforcement is due to the following causes:

1. A strong sentiment against the prohibition law, not on the part of the majority, perhaps, but on the part of a large minority.
2. Well-organized bands of law violators of all sorts. It is not only the prohibition law that is not enforced.
3. Close connection between the law breakers and the local police.
4. Complete inability of the Federal courts to handle liquor cases, when the disposition on the part of the city and county officials is to bring whatever cases they made into the Federal courts, and not to handle them under such penal laws as are

Whalen's Jay Walking Rules Suspended by Mulrooney

Pending the decisions of the courts in the test cases for pedestrian traffic violations, the police regulations against jay-walking were suspended officially yesterday by Commissioner Mulrooney.

The new rule, the last major act of Commissioner Whalen in office, will be enforced, Mr. Mulrooney said, if the police are upheld in the appeals taken by pedestrians and chauffeurs.

The Police Commissioner emphasized the need for drastic traffic regulations in certain congested areas, particularly at Fourteenth Street and Fourth Avenue. The jay-walking regulation as tested for one day and several persons were arrested by policemen who had been detailed specially for such duty. The appeals were foreseen.

M'BRIDE'S BROTHER ATTACKS DRY LEAGUE

Emmet McBride, an Ex-Field Worker, Makes Charges to La Guardia.

ASKS A HEARING ON THEM

Impugns Sincerity of Present Managers—Tells of Funds Unreported.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 31.—Charges of misconduct against the Anti-Saloon League and its leaders, including F. Scott McBride, general and legislative superintendent, have been made in a letter written by Emmet McBride, a brother of the superintendent and a field worker in Illinois for the league during 1915-17. The letter was sent to Representative Fiorello H. La Guardia and made public at his office today.

Emmet McBride is a minister and school teacher at Salineville, Ohio. When introduced to newspaper men in Representative La Guardia's office he said he wished to lay the charges he now made before the Senate lobby committee, which examined Superintendent McBride for seven days.

He made supplementary statements, which he said he would like to include in his testimony, to the effect that the league "has followed the dictates of those who have scrambled into control of the steering wheel of the machine," and concerning his relations with his two brothers in league work, General Superintendent McBride and D. L. McBride, State superintendent of the league in Minnesota.

The McBride Letter.

The letter to Mr. La Guardia, the original of which is in the New York Representative's possession follows:

Washington, D. C.,
May 29, 1930.

Hon. F. La Guardia, House Office
Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: I have offered to appear before the Senate prohibition investigation committee to submit some facts which I believe should be brought to their attention.

The Illinois leageu paid me 20 per cent of money solicited. The field agents of the league used a large part of their time even while their expenses were being paid by the league, in selling stock in a large speculation fostered by the league and which used the league organization in its development.

Superintendent McBride's predecessor as State Superintendent in Illinois, Mr. E. A. Scroggin, while still superintendent of the league, became president of a fruit juice company and developed this through the Anti-Saloon League organization. It was outlawed by the blue sky law in a number of States, and finally went into the hands of a receiver with a total loss of some $800,000 to its stock-

NANKING ABANDONS CHANGSHA TO REBELS; HANKOW IS MENACED

Reverses in South Accompany Crucial Struggle With the Northerners in Honan.

MOSCOW AGENTS ACTIVE

Strictest Precautions Taken in Hankow Area, Now Gravely Threatened by Reds.

AMERICAN SHIP ATTACKED

1,500 Bandits at Shasi Fire on the Steamer, Which Escapes—Nanking Denies Chiang Is Wounded.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SHANGHAI, May 31.—While the Nanking forces are engaged in a life-and-death battle with the Northerners on the Peking-Hankow Railway in Honan Province and along the Lunghai Railway, another threat is developing in the Yangtse Valley, where Kwangsi troops and the so-called "Ironsides," commanded by Chang Fa-kwei, who recently left the Southern provinces and advanced northward, have appeared outside Changsha, capital of Hunan Province.

As a result, the Nanking General Ho Chien is abandoning Changsha, while merchants there, realizing the inevitable capture of the city, have dispatched a delegation to welcome the conquerors and thus avoid looting of the city.

Hankow Seriously Threatened.

With the presence of several Communist armies in the Yangtse Valley adding to their difficulties, defending troops are rapidly falling back toward Hankow, which is seriously threatened and is likely to fall into the hands of anti-Nanking forces unless Chiang Kai-shek is able to spare sufficient troops to defend the area.

The Hankow military authorities are energetically erecting defenses twenty miles south of the city, and all available troops from the Peking-Hankow Railway are being sent to Hankow to defend it. Martial law has been declared there to assist the military movement.

As several Moscow agents are known to be in the vicinity and are profiting by the successes of Communist troops, the strictest precautions have been adopted in the Hankow area.

Nanking Denies Chiang Is Wounded.

NANKING, May 31 (AP).—The Nanking Government's military headquarters officially denied tonight widely spread reports that President Chiang Kai-shek had been wounded in the arm by a fragment of a bomb dropped from a rebel airplane near Kweiteh, Honan Province.

General Chiang has been personally directing operations of the government troops against the Northern Alliance armies in Eastern Honan. Fighting in that area has been heavy.

Earlier Report Contradictory.

SHANGHAI, May 31 (AP).—Reports from Nanking early today, which were accepted as authentic, said Chiang Kai-shek had been wounded in the left arm by a fragment from an aerial bomb in the neighborhood of Kweiteh.

A report from Peking two days ago said Chiang had been wounded in the arm. He is in Northern Honan Province directing military operations against the Northern forces. Recent reports have credited the Northerners with victories over the Nationalists.

Unconfirmed reports today from Honan Province said a series of Northern victories there had driven Nanking troops westward from the Haichow-Tungkwan Railroad. A second line of defense was said to

REPORT THIS WEEK SOUGHT ON TREATY

Borah Committee Will Start Preliminary Discussions Tomorrow Morning.

DRAFTING TO BEGIN SOON

At Least 14 Members Will Concur—McKellar Assails Pact as a Financial Burden.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 31.—The majority of the members of the Foreign Relations Committee, who favor ratification of the London naval treaty, will make every effort to get the treaty reported to the Senate before the end of next week.

Senator Borah, chairman of the committee, issued a call today for an executive session at 11 o'clock Monday, at which the draft of the committee's report will be discussed for the first time. It is the hope of Senator Borah that the preliminary discussions will not be prolonged, that the actual writing of the report will be under way not later than Wednesday, and that it will be finished in time for a report Friday or Saturday.

The confidential executive and State Department correspondence relating to the naval conference are now in the hands of the committee. The committee will consider them in executive session next week, but none of the documents or parts of them will be made public.

There will be, in addition to the majority report for ratification, a minority report signed by at least three members of the committee, Senators Johnson, Robinson of Indiana and Shipstead. Of the remaining seventeen members, fourteen are counted upon to favor ratification. They are Senators Borah, Capper, Gillett, Reed, Fess, Goff and Vandenberg, Republicans; Swanson, Pittman, Robinson of Arkansas, Walsh of Montana, Harrison, George and Wagner, Democrats.

Moses Unpredictable.

The three other members whose position has not been definitely disclosed are Moses, Black and La Follette. The general opinion is, however, that Senators Black and La Follette, while not enthusiastic for the treaty, will not oppose ratification. Which way Moses will jump is a question only that Senator can answer.

The daily statement of the opposition came today from Senator McKellar of Tennessee, who coupled the cost of the treaty with that of the tariff, each of which he declared will place an additional burden of more than $1,000,000,000 on the people of the country.

"When President Hoover and Premier MacDonald were at Rapidan," said Senator McKellar, "they published to the world that the two countries had agreed:

1—That there would be a limit on naval arms.
2—That there would be a reduction of arms.
3—That there would be enormous savings to the American taxpayers and to the taxpayers of other countries.
4—That there would be parity heaped up and flowing over.

McKellar Charges Failure.

"The report of the conference has come and not one of these four great objectives has been accomplished.

"There has been no limitation of arms at all, except that the United States has been prohibited, if the agreement goes into effect, from building the kind of cruisers that her experts say are necessary for her defense.

"There has been no reduction of naval arms, but, on the contrary, there will be a vast increase of naval arms after the pact is approved.

"Instead of there being savings, the lowest estimate of additional cost to the American people is over a billion dollars. When we think of the Grundy tariff bill, taxing the American people a billion dollars additional, and the London naval pact, taxing them another billion dollars, we can understand what the Rapidan promises mean.

"Instead of there being parity, to a layman it looks as if this treaty will very greatly accentuate the disparity that now exists. It will be extremely doubtful whether we will have a navy sufficient to protect our Pacific interests."

$850,000 IN DEPOSITS BY DOYLE SINCE 1926 REVEALED BY TUTTLE

Prosecutor Finds This Sum, All in One Account, Included a $11,000 Fee, Half in Cash.

MUCH DRAWN OUT, HE SAYS

Places Income of the Veterinary During This Period in Excess of $1,000,000.

DOYLE APPEARS TOMORROW

Faces Federal Grand Jury to Give Data He Has Refused—Crain to Push Permit Inquiry.

Dr. William F. Doyle, who for about ten years has represented persons seeking permits from the New York City Board of Standards and Appeals, has deposited more than $850,000 in one bank since Jan. 1, 1927, United States Attorney Tuttle said yesterday. He refused to make public the name of the bank, but it was the same one in which Dr. Doyle had deposited $274,000 in 1927 alone.

This bank account and other discoveries by Mr. Tuttle point to the probability that Dr. Doyle's income during that period was well in excess of $1,000,000. The United States Attorney found, he said, that in one instance when Dr. Doyle was paid $5,000 by check and $6,000 in cash as a fee from one realty concern, he deposited the check, but there was no record of a deposit of the cash. A further indication of an income larger than the figures given was contained in the fact that Dr. Doyle had an account in at least one other bank, according to Mr. Tuttle. This was admittedly a small account, however.

"The instance I refer to with respect to the deposit of a check but not of the cash," Mr. Tuttle explained, "was that of the Amita Realty Corporation (owner of the Lefcourt Colonial Building at Forty-first Street and Madison Avenue) which, on April 23, 1929, paid Dr. Doyle $11,000, $5,000 through the delivery of a check and $6,000 in cash. I have a record of the deposit of the check as part of a total deposit of $6,215 made on April 24, 1929. There is no record of a deposit of $6,000 in cash or anything like that sum."

Most of $850,000 Withdrawn.

Most of the $850,000 was later withdrawn from time to time, Mr. Tuttle said. He explained that he had not been able to make full comparisons as to specific deposits and the Doyle bank account as a whole. This, he said, had been due to the fact that much of the data obtained by examining witnesses had been locked up over the week-end. He was positive in his statement that the government's search for what became of Dr. Doyle's fees was far from being concluded.

Mr. Tuttle was asked whether his information was that Dr. Doyle's practice before the Board of Standards and Appeals was the chief or sole source of his income. He replied that he was not, at that time, in a position to say definitely.

In addition to his information about Dr. Doyle's bank deposits Mr. Tuttle has in his possession all of the former veterinarian's income tax returns during the period in which he has represented permit seeks before the Board of Standards and Appeals.

With these facts in his possession, and Dr. Doyle under a court order to tell the grand jury whether he ever split a fee with any one, Mr. Tuttle and his assistants feel they will be in a position to make mate-

ZEPPELIN LANDS AFTER BATTLING SQUALLS, COVERING 13,400 MILES IN 204½ HOURS; FUELS TO FLY HOME AT 10 P. M. TOMORROW

One of Landing Crew Hurt in Fall—Commander Talks Today to Airline Backers.

From a Staff Correspondent of The New York Times.

LAKEHURST, N. J., May 31.—The Graf Zeppelin, the world's premier air liner, completed her fourth voyage to the United States when she landed at the naval air station here today, proudly, safely, but not entirely undamaged.

There were twenty passengers and a crew of forty-two on board. Although the landing was perfect, with the exception of an accident which befell one of the enlisted men assisting in berthing the airship, it was discovered shortly after the Zeppelin was moved into the hangar that two struts supporting the rear gondola had been torn away

Repairs and refueling were begun at once to enable the Graf Zeppelin to begin her return trip to her home port of Friedrichshafen at 10 o'clock Monday night.

On landing, Dr. Hugo Eckener, the commander, announced that the Zeppelin had traveled 13,400 nautical miles in 204½ hours of flying. The distance traversed between Pernambuco and Lakehurst on the last lap of the voyage from Germany via Spain and South America was 3,400 nautical miles, Dr. Eckener said. The time required for the flight from the Brazilian city was sixty-nine hours.

The airship was sighted by lookouts from the naval air station at 7 o'clock this morning. At 7:25 she had landed and was safely moored to the station's new movable mooring mast. At 7:45 she was snug in the hangar, enjoying the haven she had earned after weathering what Dr. Eckener described as some of the worst storm conditions he had ever encountered.

It was while fighting the elements between Rio de Janeiro and Pernambuco that the ship suffered the injury discovered today. Although the damage had been repaired before the start on the trip to Lakehurst, another severe weather test which the Graf Zeppelin encountered last night, at about 8:30 o'clock, north of the Bermudas again tore loose the struts from their fastenings, necessitating quick temporary adjustment as the ship was fighting a squall that shook her badly. That she came through the ordeal triumphantly was another evidence of her capacity to master any difficulties, Dr. Eckener declared.

Prepares for Eighth Crossing.

The flight which the Zeppelin will begin on Monday night at 10 o'clock to Friedrichshafen will be the ship's eighth ocean crossing. She has already crossed the Atlantic six times and the Pacific, during the journey around the world, once. The airship's total mileage now is about 100,000.

The absence of crowds because of the early hour of arrival at the landing today did not mar the beauty of the spectacle, as, blanched by tropic suns and lashed by equatorial rains, with her name in letters of crimson on her side, the dirigible descended easily and gracefully almost into the arms of 250 marines and some fifty enlisted men, who "walked" her to the mooring mast, whence she was wheeled by an intricate system of cables, pulleys and landing engines into her berth in the huge hangar. Lieutenant W. E. Zimmerman, mooring officer of the Lakehurst station, was in charge of the ground crew and landing operations.

In addition to the naval officers and friends who came to greet the Graf Zeppelin, the airship was saluted on arrival by a fleet of airships and airplanes. Heading the greeting party was the Los Angeles, which only a few hours before had left the hangar in preparation for a trip to Washington, but lingered in the vicinity of Lakehurst long enough to welcome her more famous sister. For some time it was difficult for t civilians on the field to disting

GERMAN WAR ACE DIES IN CRASH HERE

Kurt Stollwerck, Flying for a French Aviation Company, Plunges at Long Beach.

CRAFT WRECKED IN OCEAN

Capt. McKinney, Stunt Flier, Is Killed in Race at Teterboro as Plane Falls at a Turn.

Special to The New York Times.

LONG BEACH, L. I., May 31.—Kurt Stollwerck, a German World War ace, said by the police to be a member of the family of Heinrich Stollwerck, the wealthy German chocolate manufacturer, was drowned shortly after 6 o'clock tonight when a plane he was demonstrating, as agent for a French airplane company, nose-dived into the ocean about 1,500 feet off shore from the fashionable Lido Country Club Hotel.

The plane, diving with power on from an altitude of only 150 or 300 feet, was wrecked. Volunteers and the crew of a Coast Guard cutter searched for the flier's body but failed to find it.

Mr. Stollwerck, who was about 35 years old, had been visiting in this country as agent for the Alverio Company, a French airplane manufacturing concern. He was to have returned to his home in Germany to rejoin his wife in two weeks, according to his friend, Charles L. Frambach, a member of the Lido Club. Mr. Stollwerck had been Mr. Frambach's guest for the day, together with Major William A. Tilt, a retired army officer.

Throughout the afternoon he had been demonstrating the ship by tak-

MARINE FLIER WINS CURTISS TROPHY

Capt. A. H. Page, Lone Entrant of Branch, Averages 164.08 Miles an Hour.

SETS NEW MARK FOR EVENT

Victor Surpasses 23 Rival Pilots of Navy—Stunts Aloft Thrill Throng at Capital.

From a Staff Correspondent of The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 31.—Captain Arthur H. Page of the Quantico Marines, the lone representative of his branch of the service in the event, took first place today against twenty-three navy pilots in the eleventh annual Curtiss Marine Trophy race.

Captain Page not only won the race but also set a new record for the Curtiss trophy, averaging 164.08 miles an hour for a hundred miles over the diamond-shaped course above the Potomac River off the Anacostia naval station. The old record, set last year by Lieutenant W. G. Tomlinson, was 162 miles an hour.

It was not only a triumph for the Marines but also a victory especially pleasing to the adherents of the water-cooled engine. Captain Page flew a Curtiss-Hawk powered with a Curtiss D-12 water-cooled V-type engine.

His little seaplane was stream-lined to the last possible degree of efficiency in a service type machine and this stream-lining spelled the difference in speed between it and the other aircraft in the race. The rules for the race require that all entries be strictly on the service lines, and this prevented the use of special cowling for the air-cooled Wasps, Hornets and Whirlwinds in the event, this device not yet having been made regulation in the navy.

Dirigible Lets Loose a Glider.

The race itself was a climax to an afternoon of aeranautics which held the attention of a crowd of 15,000 persons. Early this morning the navy dirigible Los Angeles appeared over Washington and this afternoon sailed majestically over the Naval Air Station. At 3,000 feet a glider let go from the under side of her big hull carrying Lieutenant T. G. W. Settle, former navy record holder for free balloons. He cruised about over Bolling Field and Anacostia for ten minutes before bringing his light craft to earth.

No sooner had the Los Angeles let go of one heavier-than-air passenger than she took on another. Lieut. Commander C. A. Nicholson pushed his little Vought up beneath the big hull and, after several attempts, succeeded in hooking the plane to the "landing" bar extending down fifteen feet or so beneath the airship.

This has been done successfully many times before, but the crowd enjoyed it just the same. The stunt calls for extraordinary skill in flying, the deviation of an inch or two in the plane of flight spelling the difference between success and failure.

Lieutenant C. F. Schilt of the marines, who was decorated for his

Soldier Accidentally Kills Two Children, Starting New Riots in City of Peshawar

From a Special Correspondent.
Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PESHAWAR, May 31.—Fresh trouble was precipitated in Peshawar today by an accident at Kabuli Gate, the ancient entrance to the city leading to the Kisha Khani, the street of story-tellers. A lance corporal of the King's Own Yorkshire Light Infantry was cleaning his rifle when the weapon was accidentally discharged. The bullet struck a topga—a small horse-drawn carriage—passing through the gate, and killed two young Sikh children and severely wounded their mother. The atmosphere is still tense in the bazaars, and this incident had a bad effect on the temper of the crowd. A mob of several hundred gathered outside a police station, and, when dispersed, marched through the bazaars.

Here they came in contact with a small detachment of an Essex regiment. The excited crowd attacked the troops and endeavored to seize their rifles. It was necessary to open fire on the crowd, but the casualties were light. The city is reported quiet again this afternoon.

The tribal situation in the hills that ring this city is still uncertain. The Royal Air Force today continued its bombardment of the caves where Badshah Gul, a son of the Haji of Turangzai, has been in hiding throughout the week. The airmen's task is difficult, as the Mohmand hills in their configuration are not unlike the steep cliffs flanking Colorado's Grand Canyon, and every nook is a nest of hiding places into which the tribesmen crawl until danger is past.

Each fresh communiqué on the Rangoon riots increases the death toll, which now is officially stated as nearly 200. This figure probably will be increased still further, as many deaths have not been reported to the police. It is reported the police have suffered heavily in their efforts to restore order.

President Fishes at Camp in Pennsylvania; Bundled Up, He Traps Trout, Shy on Cold Day

Special to The New York Times.

WILLIAMSPORT, Pa., May 31.—Hidden in the Pennsylvania mountains at the camp of Jay Cooke 3d, of Philadelphia, President Hoover indulged today in his favorite sport of trout fishing.

On either side of him rose tall, thickly wooded hills, and the weather was cool, but the President was warmly wrapped in sweaters and a leather coat. Before him ran the rippling Larry's Creek into which he seldom waded, because the water was so chilly.

The air was cold—the thermometer dropped to 35 degrees at the camp last night.

Mr. Hoover caught only seven or eight fish in the forenoon, but, undaunted, he returned to the quest in the late afternoon and met indifferent success, his creel showing a comparatively poor result for such a scientific angler.

From early morning until late afternoon, a brisk wind whipped the waters of the little creek, and the trout remained in their nooks under the rock, but, nevertheless, the President, taunted them with his flies, seeking to lure them to the surface. For the most part, he used a Royal Coachman and a Cahill.

Tonight the President retired to his little room, spartanly furnished with a bed, bureau, washstand and two chairs, and slept soundly before a long journey to Washington tomorrow. He expects to leave the camp soon after breakfast and motor to Harrisburg where he will lunch with Governor John S. Fisher of Pennsylvania, one of his companions on the fishing trip. Immediately afterward he will start for Washington, a distance of about 130 miles, which he hopes to accomplish by midafternoon.

President Hoover's visit with Jay Cooke 3d recalls the affiliation of the Cooke family with several Presidents. Jay Cooke, the Civil War financier, became an international figure during the Grant Administration when he aided the government in floating loans at a time when confidence was at a low ebb.

About the same period Jay Cooke became active in the development of the Northwest, especially in opening the region at the head of the Great Lakes. Two years ago, when President Coolidge was spending his Summer in that section, he frequently passed by the statue of Jay Cooke, erected in Duluth as an acknowledgment of the financier's activities in that section.

PENNSYLVANIA WETS SEEK A 'MORROW'

Anti-Prohibitionists Set Forth the Type of Man They Want for Gubernatorial Race.

DO NOT AGREE ON METHOD

One Faction Favors Another Party—Another Advocates Backing Democratic Candidate.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., May 31.—Leaders in the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, who are seeking a wet candidate to oppose Gifford Pinchot, dry Republican nominee, in the November Gubernatorial election have set Ambassador Dwight W. Morrow as their standard, but are finding it difficult to discover a candidate who measures up to his qualifications, it was indicated today.

Mr. Morrow, in his keynote speech in the New Jersey Senatorial campaign, advocated repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment and the establishment of a system that would give control of the liquor traffic to the States. The Pennsylvania wets like this program but are divided as to the proper method of selecting their man.

Some of the wet leaders, taking a stand against the pre-empted ticket method, favor supporting John M. Hemphill, the Democratic candidate, provided the Democratic State Committee, in its forthcoming meeting, advocates prohibition repeal. Mr. Hemphill himself, the anti-prohibitionists have been advised, holds liberal views on the question, as does Sedgwick Kistler, the Democratic nominee for Senator.

Directions of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment are understood to be in favor of disregarding the Democratic ticket and pre-empting their own slate. The association is threatening to pre-empt a party title, but Harmon M. Kephart, former State Treasurer and a supporter of Francis Shunk Brown, Vare candidate for Governor in the primary campaign, already has pre-empted the title "Personal Liberty Party." Whether his group and the heads of the association will get together is thus far in doubt.

One group of wets, using Mr. Morrow as their "yardstick," discussed the possibility of drafting former Ambassador Henry P. Fletcher as a Gubernatorial candidate. Mr. Fletcher, however, promptly announced that he would stand by the Republican ticket named at the primary.

Representative James M. Beck, one of the outspoken wets in Congress and widely known throughout the State, has been suggested in some quarters as a fitting bearer of the wet standard, but because of his attitude in the primary campaign some of the wet leaders are understood to have a feeling of coolness toward him.

He was criticized for taking the stump in behalf of the Vare candidates, the wets pointing out that although he personally was an unequivocal opponent of the dry laws, he was supporting Francis Shunk Brown, a "prohibition straddler," for Governor. Others, however, believe that Mr. Beck, because of his alliance with the Vare organization, his personal wet views and his ability as an orator, would make an ideal candidate for Governor.

It was reported today that an attempt might be made to induce Major General William G. Price to run for the wets. General Price, like State Senator Horace W. Schantz of Lehigh County, another suggested candidate, was in a receptive mood for the Republican nomination in the primary. The move in behalf of General Price is said to have originated with war veterans.

Realizing that the prohibition issue probably will have an important place in the campaign, Mr. Pinchot is endeavoring to make sure that dry voters in the up-State districts are made eligible for the election.

Judge at Pittsburgh Says Alcohol Smell Alone Is Not Enough.

PITTSBURGH, May 31 (AP).—Federal Judge R. M. Gibson today ruled that a smell of an alcoholic character is no basis for a search warrant.

Ordering the quashing of a warrant used by prohibition agents and suppression of evidence seized in their raid on premises occupied by William J. Brothers, the Court said: "Plus suspicion, a mere alcoholic odor may indicate a violation of the law, but standing alone it does not indicate it."

Judge Gibson said the agents were indefinite in setting forth their reason for believing the law was being violated on the premises.

Baltimoreans Rally to Support of Zealot Who 'Edited' Poe Monument With a Chisel

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, Md., May 31.—Edmond Fontaine, plant pathologist, who chiseled a superfluous letter "s" from the word "mortals" in a quotation on the Poe monument in Wyman Park here and who was called "a martyr to the cause of truth and beauty" by Mrs. Sally Bruce Kinsolving, president of the Poetry Society of Maryland, seems sure of acquittal here next week on a charge of defacing public property, it was learned today.

Members of the poetry society, it is said, will stand by Fontaine. Mrs. Kinsolving, herself a poetess and wife of the Rev. Dr. Arthur B. Kinsolving, rector of the Old St. Paul's Episcopal Church, the membership of which includes leaders in Baltimore society, in an interview today declared that "like all martyrs to the cause of truth and beauty, Mr. Fontaine will have to solace himself with the comforting thought that no act devoted to their interest is ever lost. His ardent risk of personal suffering is in itself a rebuke to those who have shared his protesting spirit and yet have refrained from taking the proper action to remove the offending letter.

"Mr. Fontaine also may allow himself the satisfaction of knowing that, however procrastinating, these too are rejoicing with him that the letter no longer exists."

She added that at a committee meeting of the Edgar Allen Poe society last January it was suggested that steps be taken soon by the society to replace the present "disintegrating base of the monument with a worthier one bearing the proper inscription."

Fontaine today admitted having reversed the Coolidge-Borglum process by doing his editing in stone, but pointed out that in addition to chiseling off the offending "s" he had spent nearly an hour scrubbing away a daub of black paint or tar that had besmirched the statue for some time.

He added that he had performed both operations out of regard for Poe's memory.

When Fontaine was arrested and locked up because he was unable to supply cash bond the turnkey who searched him before placing him in a cell removed from his pocket a copy of "Chief American Poets," an anthology edited by Curtis Page. He was released later without bail in custody of his brother-in-law, W. J. Mann Jr. Poe's tomb in Old Westminster Presbyterian Churchyard here is a mecca for tourists.

FIVE MORE CITIES WET IN FINAL TABULATION

Irvington, N. J., Gives Vote of More Than 7 to 1 Against Enforcement in Digest Poll.

Five more cities with majorities against enforcement were listed yesterday in a supplementary report that completes the tabulation of The Literary Digest prohibition poll. One of the cities, Bloomington, Ind., showed a plurality for enforcement. Four cities gave anti-enforcement majorities in second reports, although one polled also an enforcement plurality.

A vote of more than 7 to 1 against enforcement was shown in the first report from Irvington, N. J. That city, as well as Chico, Cal., and Salisbury, Md., gave a plurality for repeal. Ironton, Ohio, polling an anti-enforcement majority, gave a few more votes to modification than to repeal.

Asheville, N. C., in a second report, cast an enforcement plurality, with repeal in second place. Mount Clemens, Mich., registered a repeal plurality that fell just short of a majority. Leavenworth, Kan., and Aurora, Ill., gave somewhat smaller pluralities for repeal. The tabulation follows:

RIVALS ARE QUERIED BY FRELINGHUYSEN

Asks Morrow and Fort to Give Stand on Tariff, World Court and League.

'HOME BREW' TALK COMING

Fort Says He Will Clear Up Differences of Opinion Regarding Washington Speech.

Joseph S. Frelinghuysen, opponent of Dwight W. Morrow and Franklin W. Fort for the Republican nomination for United States Senator from New Jersey, demanded yesterday that his adversaries state their views on the pending tariff bill, the World Court and the League of Nations.

Speaking at Woodberry during a tour of Gloucester County, the former Senator accused his rivals of avoiding vital issues. Mr. Frelinghuysen said he had already given his position and was awaiting definite declarations on these points from his opponents.

Meanwhile, Mr. Morrow's managers prepared an invasion of Mercer County on Wednesday, when the Ambassador to Mexico is scheduled to speak in Trenton. Another speech is set for next Friday in Paterson.

Mr. Fort will campaign actively this week, and a meeting is being arranged in Newark for his promised speech on "Home Brew," which may be delivered in Central High School on June 12. Because of uncertainty over adjusting radio time, final decision on the date had not been made. Mr. Fort asserted that speakers for his opponents had so distorted his recent speech in Congress that he intended to devote an entire address to the subject of prohibition.

Plans Fort "Clarification" Speech.

"Our committee," said Albert H. Howe, Mr. Fort's campaign manager, "will attempt to comply with requests for 'clarification' in Newark. There has been a countrywide interest shown in Mr. Fort's definite stand on the essential issue of his campaign."

Mr. Frelinghuysen's efforts to draw out his opponents on the international policy of this country brought applause from his audience in Woodberry. He asked also for their opinions on public utility regulations.

Advisers of the former Senator have been suggesting to him that he concentrate on the World Court and the League of Nations in the final weeks of the campaign. They believe he would make points against Mr. Morrow on this score. Mr. Frelinghuysen was an ardent enemy of the League when in the Senate just after the World War and he is on record as a foe of the World Court as well.

Morrow to Announce Stand.

The Ambassador, on the other hand, is expected to state his position in one of his remaining speeches if he finds an opportunity. His supporters said that he had no intention of advocating any legitimate issue, but that with a limited number of speeches planned it was necessary for him to select his subjects with care. Subjects of his talks in Trenton and Paterson were not disclosed.

Former Senator Frelinghuysen during his tour of South Jersey denied that he would retire from the campaign. "Absolutely untrue," he said.

About 300 Bergen County supporters of Mr. Morrow called on the candidate yesterday at his Englewood home. The Ambassador stood on the porch and greeted the visitors as they arrived. He did not make a speech.

'BLUE LAW' VIGILANCE TO GO ON IN TRENTON

Public Safety Director Orders Police to Continue Listing of Open Movie Houses Today.

Special to The New York Times.

TRENTON, N. J., May 31.—By order of Director of Public Safety George B. Labarre, the police are to continue tomorrow the listing of violations of the ancient vice and immorality act, commonly called the "blue laws." The work was begun last Sunday. After a week from tomorrow the evidence is to be presented to the Mercer County grand jury.

Decision to check up on violations was reached after ministers and a committee of laymen of the various Protestant churches had protested against the operation of motion picture theatres on Sundays. Mr. Labarre refused to order them closed on the ground that he could not properly discriminate against them while permitting the sale of tobacco, candy and other such articles, the playing of tennis, golf and baseball, and the running of street cars, motor buses and the like.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., May 31.—The fourth episode of New Brunswick's cereal drama, "Bread, Rolls and Blue Laws," was eagerly awaited tonight. Interest, already whetted by the ingenuity which twice brought this city its supply of Sunday contraband rolls, was heightened because no one knew exactly what was going to happen.

The city's merchants vowed they would have their rolls even if they again had to meet a truck from Newark outside the city limits.

One merchant said he understood that a Perth Amboy baker would join the lone Newark baker in bringing bread to New Brunswick. He said New Brunswick would get its bread and rolls, "bootleg or otherwise."

CANADIANS PUT BAN ON RUM SHIPMENTS

Ten Docks Are Closed Opposite Detroit as New Embargo Law Takes Effect.

IMPORTS END AT BUFFALO

Border Agents Expect Surcease Until Rum-Runners Align Forces to New Conditions.

Special to The New York Times.

DETROIT, May 31.—Ten export docks in the border cities, the bottle neck for the huge volume of Canadian liquor which flows across the Detroit River, were closed today by Andrew Dalziel, collector of customs at Windsor, and officers were withdrawn from them.

Mr. Dalziel acted on instructions from Ottawa, given after the passage of the new Canadian law which bans the export of liquor to the United States. The Ottawa telegraphic order read:

"Refuse clearance to all vessels with liquor cargoes destined for the United States and refuse any other official documentation covering such liquor."

The Canadian law, which became effective today, requires exporters to post a double duty bond, which is returned only when exporters satisfy Dominion port officials that the liquor has not been short-circuited to the United States.

It is thought the law means the end of the small bootlegger who cannot finance the double bonds required and will enable officials to concentrate on the liquor which is coming over in carloads and by air.

It is estimated that 5,000 or more cases of Canadian liquor were smuggled into Michigan Friday night in anticipation of the liquor ban.

Traffic Ceases at Buffalo.

BUFFALO, May 31 (AP).—Liquor-running activities across the international border in this vicinity have been at a standstill for several days, it was disclosed today, in anticipation of enactment of the law by Canada prohibiting the exportation of liquor to the United States.

Federal officials said they expected smuggling operations would stop entirely for a few days while the smugglers aligned their forces to meet the changed situation.

One pronounced effect of the new Canadian law was expected to be a sharp reduction in the size of the boats used in the liquor smuggling trade.

Smaller craft, too small to require clearance papers, would be in great demand, one official pointed out, whereas in the past a large liquor cargo could be cleared from a Canadian port, making it well worth the owner's while to take his chances in American waters.

An inevitable effect of changed conditions was expected to be an increase in prices of retail liquor in Buffalo and vicinity, the assumption being based on similar increases following each new step taken against liquor smuggling in the past.

JUDGE VAUSE FACES SUIT FOR REMOVAL

Action Won by Ward Seems Assured on Charge Jurist Accepted Free Trips to Europe.

A suit by Attorney General Hamilton Ward to remove County Judge W. Bernard Vause of Kings seemed a certainty yesterday in connection with the charge that he committed a misdemeanor in accepting free transportation to Europe at the expense of the United American Lines while holding public office.

District Attorney Crain, who preferred the charges, announced that at the request of the Attorney General he had made an appointment for Albert B. Unger, one of his assistants, to confer with a representative of the Attorney General's office Tuesday. Supreme Court Justice William T. Collins, who accompanied Judge Vause on one of the free trips in 1926, is to have a hearing on the same charge that day.

The same section of the State Constitution which makes it mandatory for the District Attorney to proceed against officeholders who accept gratuities from steamship lines, even though the statute of limitations interposes itself as in this case, provides for forfeiture of office by those guilty of violating its provisions.

Justice Collins was County Clerk at the time. Because his term of office has expired he is not subject to removal by the Attorney General, but Judge Vause still is holding the same office he held when he went to Europe as the guest of the United American Lines, which paid him $250,000 for helping them obtain leases to two city-owned piers. This fee is the subject of investigations by Mr. Crain and United States Attorney Tuttle, both of whom have intimated that they suspect it was used as "a slush fund," in whole or in part.

ARREST 3 IN $35,000 FRAUD.

Pittsburgh Police Charge Bank Employe With Embezzling Plot.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURGH, Pa., May 31.—Charged with conspiracy and embezzlement in defrauding the Western Savings and Deposit Bank of a sum estimated at $35,000, three men, including a bank bookkeeper, were held for court today in Central Police court.

The prisoners are George Coleman, 23; Max Green, 32, and William J. Carlton.

Coleman, a bookkeeper, is said to have admitted padding the account of Green in order that overdrafts on his account would pass through the institution. Carleton was taken into custody when it was discovered some of the money had been deposited to his account. He said he was a victim of Coleman. Both Coleman and Green exonerated Carleton.

5. A tendency on the part of the city officials to hamper Federal enforcement officers in many obscure ways.

Floating Population Cited.

"In a city the size of New York, with an alien population of 1,500,000 and a transient population estimated at half a million that is changing daily, there is a tendency to laxness in conduct and open violations of law not seen under other conditions.

"Liquor laws in New York were always violated with more or less immunity or evaded in a successful manner. The condition is not new. There is a mass of city ordinances and State statutes dealing with the subject dating back to the control of the first tavern opened at 1 Broadway in the seventeenth century.

"Selling liquor after hours and in connection with gambling, prostitution and crime has been a problem for years. The liquor interests have always been allied closely with politics in the city, and the situation is no different today.

"So with this combination of forces against law enforcement, the 168 enforcement officers in the local prohibition administrator's office have a tremendous task. The wonder is that they have accomplished what they have.

"Compared with this small number of Federal enforcement officers, there are over 17,000 city police. With Section 1,530 of the penal code upheld by the State courts, it would seem that if there were any disposition on the part of city officials to clean up the illegal selling of liquor it could be done, even without the aid of a State enforcement law. The fact is that there is no such disposition.

Many Complaints Received.

"There come to the New York prohibition administrator's office daily many complaints made by citizens of liquor law violations and the resulting nuisances. Most of them state that the matter has been called to the attention of the local police captain, but that nothing has been done to relieve the situation.

"Some of these complaints are unsigned; many are creditable and are signed by property owners or residents.

"Regardless of the motive of the complaint, it is investigated by the Federal investigators as rapidly as possible. There are only eight investigators in the local office, and much of their time is spent on the larger phases of the work.

"In the hope of getting quicker action on this class of complaints, which are usually police cases, copies of all complaints in photostatic form are sent to the office of the Police Commissioner, with a request that he act under the authority of Section 1,530 of the penal code.

"These complaints are promptly returned from the commissioner's office with no comment and no acknowledgment of receipt. Every one of these complaints, after investigation, showed they were bona fide, could be handled under the existing laws, and the nuisance complained of could be abated.

"The samples of these complaints are reproduced here; a uniform letter is used to accompany each complaint that is sent to the Police Commissioner:

Dear Sir:

There is referred to you herewith, for such attention as you may believe appropriate, a photostatic copy of a communication in which violation of Section 1530 of the State penal code is alleged at (address withheld). Dear Sir:

I am notifying you of a place at (address withheld), between Second and Third Avenues. The name of the owner is ——; he also has a partner, but I can't recall his name. In this place he keeps a boarding houes and a gambling house.

He has thirty barrels of whisky and he has a cellar rented right up next to the store at — East Thirty-ninth Street, where he keeps the wine. He sells this wine to the men that go there. The whisky he keeps in the kitchen in the closets and other places.

He was arrested and put under bail once before for keeping this speakeasy, but that doesn't seem to bother him at all. When you go there do not let him bulldoze you about this place. I know just what is going on, as I am a married woman with five children and he takes my husband away from home so as to go there and gamble his pay and drink.

So I made up my mind that this had to stop, as I can hardly afford to buy a piece of bread for my children. He sells wine and whisky from morning till night. The best time for you to go is New Year's Eve or New Year's Day. So please take heed to my warning, for these foreigners think they can get away with anything here in America. (Unsigned.)

Charged Sailor Was Beaten.

Jan. 22, 1930.

Prohibition Administrator, 641 Washington Street, New York City.

Dear Sir:

We would like your assistance in closing up once and for all the nuisance that is being operated at the following address, —— Broad Street, New York City.

This place is located in the first store north of the —— store.

A thriving business is carried on at this place. They not only violate the law by selling liquor, but get their customers drunk and beat and rob them.

One case in particular we wish to cite is that of a young seaman who went in there to get a drink. He was robbed, badly beaten and thrown out on the street. As a result of this treatment he will probably carry the scars for the rest of his life.

As our work for seamen is to see that no evil influences are allowed to grow that take from them liberty or physical well-being, your cooperation and assistance will be greatly appreciated.

Yours truly,
—— ——, Manager.

Shooting and Stabbing Reported.

Jan. 15, 1930.

Director Federal Prohibition, New York City.

I wish to report that at —— Charles Street (basement), New York City, a so-called speakeasy or saloon is being operated. This place is undoubtedly the most vile place in the city, a breeding place for crime and absolutely open to the public (no questions asked).

This morning several patrons coming out of the place engaged in an argument which resulted in six pistol shots being fired and a man being fatally wounded.

Last Sunday at 8 A. M. the same thing occurred, only this time the victim was stabbed outside of this place and left bleeding to death in the street.

All this has been known to the Police Department, but still the place remains wide open for the sale of liquor and dope. Therefore I am notifying your office to act according to your custom of investigating and closing up the hell-holes.

CHARLES STREET CITIZEN.

Police Put Blame on Drys.

"Occasionally there will be an outburst of raiding by the New York police and several hundred cases will be thrown into the Federal courts, swamping them beyond hope of accomplishment.

"To keep the dockets clean the Federal District Attorney will accept pleas of guilty and the court will assess fines simply to get the cases off the docket. The city police then let it be known that they have done their part, but that the Federal officials do not follow up the good work, a manifestly unfair criticism, as here also every case could be handled in the State or county courts under Section 1530 of the penal code."

Here the commission gave a tabulation of figures under the heading of "condensed facts and figures on the enforcement program in New York State." It follows:

Lack of State Law a Factor.

Pointing to New York as presenting an outstanding example of a State that has no enforcement act, Dr. Doran said:

"Lack of a State law has made possible excuses for non-performance on the part of many State and city officers. This non-action in enforcement has, of course, increased the work of the Federal authorities and decreased the results obtained, as will be shown."

Dr. Doran then gave figures to illustrate the results accomplished by Federal agencies alone in Federal courts in New York, the figures being for 1929, in the four judicial districts of New York. In 1923, he said, there were seven Federal judges in New York State; in 1929, eighteen.

The figures for 1929 follow:

Indictments—13,201.
Dismissed—1,810.
Acquitted—110.
Pending—2,890.
Convictions—10,840.
Fines—$881,699.
Sentences (years)—108.

After the repeal of the Mullan-Gage law, Dr. Doran said, a section of the State penal code was relied upon to bring liquor cases in the State courts. It is Section 1530 (the nuisance section), and was found to be effective, he said, and the New York Court of Appeals ruled that it might be so invoked.

"The usual distinction regarding law observance in rural communities and in large cities is evident in New York. In the villages or smaller towns, and even the smaller cities up-State, enforcement is fairly carried out. Sheriffs and local officers make cases, but bring them in the Federal courts of necessity, thereby crowding the Federal courts with police cases.

"In the larger towns of New York there is no attempt at initiative in enforcing the laws against intoxicating liquor, but when the Federal authorities call on the local police for help it is given, with some exceptions—notably New York City.

Geography Adds Difficulties.

"The geographical location of New York State makes enforcement difficult, even under the best conditions and assuming that all State officers cooperated effectively under a State law. The long stretch of Canadian border on the north, with water transportation available, and the ocean front at New York City and on Long Island offer exceptional opportunities to liquor and other smugglers.

"New York State police have a restraining influence all over the State, and their work will be shown in figures. The customs bureau maintains a border patrol at the Canadian line, which cooperates with Federal and State officers in stopping smuggling at the border.

"In the opinion of the heads of the border patrol, the smuggling of liquor in 1929 was not more than 5 per cent of what it was in 1923. Ninety per cent of the smuggling cases caught have to do with other commodities than liquor.

"'Rum Row,' on the Atlantic coast off New York City, was entirely broken up by the Coast Guard. Frequent attempts to smuggle on the ocean front are made and some of them are successful, but Coast Guard cutters keep the smuggling vessels moving, so that it is difficult to establish contact with the small boats that can land contraband of every description on the shores of Long Island and New York.

"The work of the New York State police is shown in the number of arrests made for violations of Federal liquor laws:

Year.	Arrests.	Convictions.	Pending.
1926	493	88	391
1927	697	127	554
1928	585	111	457

"It should be remembered that all of these cases have to be brought in the Federal courts, which accounts for the relatively small number of convictions and the large number of cases pending. If New York had a State enforcement act, or had these cases been brought under Section 1530 of the State penal code, a larger number of convictions would have resulted.

"The situation in the larger cities of New York, like Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, Utica and Albany, is probably better than in New York City, but the same forces in opposition to law enforcement are apparent in all the larger cities of New York State."

In discussing the situation from a national viewpoint Dr. Doran said public opinion and State cooperation were prime factors in effective enforcement.

Enforcement, he said, varies in direct proportion to (1) the sentiment regarding the law in any community, (2) the clear understanding by the Federal and State officials of their respective duties and obligations, and (3) the close cooperation between State and Federal enforcement agencies.

"If the enforcement of the laws is not what it should be, the blame cannot attach to the legal material at the hands of the enforcement authorities, nor can it consistently be laid at the doors of the Federal authorities," Commissioner Doran continued, after showing that most States have enforcement acts, and likewise have concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal Government in enforcing the Volstead law.

Before the Volstead act was passed thirty-two States were under bone-dry prohibition laws. They comprised three-quarters of the territory of the country and about 51,000,000 population. In sixteen other States there were counties and sections comprising over 14,000,000 inhabitants that had prohibition under local option laws.

"It is becoming increasingly apparent to those observing the progress of the enforcement of the national prohibition act," Dr. Doran continued, "that a clearer conception must be had of the respective functions of the Federal and State governments under the concurrent clause of the Eighteenth Amendment.

"In those States where State officials generally put into action what they tacitly agree is their duty under the concurrent clause, much better results will be achieved.

"Federal delegation is to enforce the provisions of the Eighteenth Amendment in the forty-eight States, the District of Columbia, Territories and possessions. The Federal Government must do what the States fail to do.

"What the States do the Federal Government is discharged from the obligation of doing. State obligation comes under a double power—the inherent police power of the State to regulate liquor traffic and the power conferred on the State by the United States in the Eighteenth Amendment.

"The reasoning seems logical, sensible and plain laws provide plenty of authority for any State official to proceed legally against any violator."

"Where close cooperation between city, county and State officials with Federal officers exists there is good enforcement. Where cooperation does not exist for any reason whatever, enforcement is not so good. The burden put upon the Federal enforcement machinery is too heavy.

"In five States, New York, Maryland, Montana, Wisconsin and Nevada, that have no enforcement code, it has been proven that the State officials can fall back on the concurrent power given them by the Eighteenth Amendment to enforce the national prohibition law, if they wish to do so.

"The legal machinery has been set up," Dr. Doran concluded. "It is ready for use. Whether it is used or not depends in the last analysis of public opinion."

Mulrooney Defers Comment.

When Police Commissioner Mulrooney was informed last night of Commissioner Doran's statement, he said he would make no comment until he had read the statement in its entirety, and had given it some thought.

WAGNER IS SLATED AS KEYNOTE ORATOR

Roosevelt Said to Favor Senator for Temporary Chairman of Democratic Convention.

SMITH'S STATUS IN DOUBT

Ex-Governor Had Been Mentioned to Make Speech, Outlining Party Issues.

GOVERNOR ENDS HOLIDAY

Returns From the South, Feeling Fit, He Says—Sees Leaders Here Before Going to Albany.

Senator Robert F. Wagner in all probability will be temporary chairman of the Democratic State Convention to be held either at Buffalo or Rochester this Fall. Following Governor Roosevelt's return from a month's holiday at Warm Springs, Ga., it was learned that Senator Wagner who, in his address to the delegates, would sound the keynote of the Democratic State campaign and become the most important functionary at the convention, most likely would be invited to preside over the convention while working under temporary organization.

The Governor, it was said, would recommend Senator Wagner at conferences with Democratic leaders prior to a meeting of the Democratic State Committee, which has been called to assemble at Albany on June 17 to fix a time and place and issue the official call for the State convention. It is regarded as certain that the State committee and subsequently the convention will ratify any recommendation from the Governor.

While former Governor Alfred E. Smith is said to have pledged himself to take the warpath for Governor Roosevelt's re-election, it could not be learned whether he had been considered for any function at the convention. Owing to his familiarity with State issues, many had thought that he might be the keynote orator. But, as has been pointed out, Senator Wagner, owing to his long service in the State Legislature, part of the time as Democratic leader in the State Senate, is almost as familiar as the former Democratic Governor with problems of the State.

Speculation on Dry Issue.

Governor Roosevelt did not make any comment on the probable selection of Senator Wagner for temporary chairman of the convention. In another quarter it was suggested that picking the United States Senator might have certain advantages, one being that, unlike ex-Governor Smith, Senator Wagner would not be hampered by any position taken by the preceding Democratic administration at the Capitol on problems confronting the State which again will become issues in the campaign this Autumn.

Nor, it was pointed out, would Senator Wagner be bound by the advanced stand taken by ex-Governor Smith on the wet and dry issue as a Presidential candidate in 1928. There has been much speculation with regard to the probable position on prohibition to be taken this year by the Democrats, although as a party they are regarded as 100 per cent wet.

It has been suggested that the Governor has remained in line with the prohibition views of his party as a matter of political expediency rather than from personal inclination, and that the 1930 Democratic party pronunciamento on prohibition in this State might be drafted with due regard to the prospect that in 1932 the present Governor might appear as a contender for the Presidential nomination, in which case the feelings of Democratic drys in the South and West would have to be considered.

Governor Leaves for Albany.

Governor Roosevelt arrived at the Pennsylvania Station at 11:45 this forenoon. He was driven to his home at 49 East Sixty-fifth Street, where he conferred with James A. Farley, secretary of the Democratic State Committee; Major Gen. William N. Haskell, commanding officer of the National Guard, and Guernsey T. Cross, secretary to the Governor. He left at 2 P. M. for Albany.

The Governor would not comment on reports that M. William Bray, chairman of the Democratic State Committee, might offer his resignation as chairman at the meeting of the committee on June 17. He made it clear, however, that if Mr. Bray should desire to serve out his term, which ends after the September primaries, there could be no objection.

He said he was not yet in a position to announce his appointments for a number of commissions created by the Legislature. The most important of these is the commission of five members to study the proposed St. Lawrence River water-power development. Mr. Roosevelt said he hoped to be able to name the members of this commission within a week or so.

Governor Roosevelt said he had enjoyed his holiday in the South most thoroughly and had obtained a good rest. He appeared in better health than at any time since he has been Governor. He has been driving an automobile for some years. In his recent holiday at Warm Springs he took up horseback riding and said he had come to like it.

The Governor last night delivered an address before the Knights of Columbus at Schenectady. Monday he will motor to Boston for the wedding of his eldest son, James Roosevelt, who is to be married on Wednesday to Miss Betsey Cushing.

He will return to this city on Thursday to deliver a radio address. On Saturday he will review the National Guard at Van Cortlandt Park, leaving at night for Rochester, where he is to assist in the dedication of a new church. On the following Monday he will attend the commencement exercises at the Syracuse University and on the following day will deliver two addresses at Utica, one before the Mayors' conference and one at night at a Democratic dinner to be attended by party leaders.

Edison, in Role of Telegrapher, Will Open New Florida Bridge

FORT MYERS, Fla., May 31 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison will hark back to the days of his youth and pound a telegraph key to open on July 4 a new bridge here named in his honor.

The inventor plans to leave Fort Myers June 15, but he will sit in his laboratory at East Orange, N. J., on Independence Day and operate the telegraph instrument that will set in motion the machinery operating the drawbridge 1,100 miles away.

The structure spans the Caloosahatchee River.

ROOSEVELT PRAISES K. OF C. CHARITIES

Governor at Schenectady Convention Pays Tribute to the Order's Services.

RECALLS AID IN WAR TIME

Walter A. Lynch of New York Is Elected State Deputy at Closing Session.

Special to The New York Times.

SCHENECTADY, May 31.—Paying a tribute to the charitable work of the Knights of Columbus, Governor Roosevelt, in an address at the final session of the State convention of the order tonight emphasized its cooperation with other organizations while retaining for its members the opportunity "to carry out the idea of doing one good turn daily."

"It is obvious that government, whether it be State or local, could not undertake more than a limited amount of welfare activities," the Governor said.

"For example, the State has a fairly definite function in caring for the feeble-minded and the insane. In other words, for those unfortunate human beings who have to become wards of somebody. To private organizations, however, must be left the training and care of the hundreds of thousands who, in order to insure better citizenship, require some kind of outside assistance.

"That care is being given more largely and more intelligently every year by private organizations, many of them of a fraternal character such as the Knights of Columbus.

"It is necessary, however, for us to think in the years to come of what might be called the co-ordination of all of these splendid efforts.

"It is right that each private organization should retain absolutely its own identity and at the same time see to it that there is no unnecessary duplication of the ends sought to be accomplished.

"One of the best examples, I know, is the situation in the city of New York, where the Catholic Charities maintain a separate organization and at the same time cooperate wholeheartedly with the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, the Charity Organization Society and the United Jewish Charities.

"So, in a State-wide sense, we need the individual identity of the various fraternal orders, but at the same time it is necessary that they shall work together for the common good. It is a splendid thing that the Knights of Columbus have consistently shown this spirit.

"As you all know, I have for many years been deeply interested in the problem of the crippled child. This is a task especially for private charity and yet the actual problem is so complicated that it is perhaps doubtful if any one organization can cover the whole range of the care of cripples.

"For instance, there is the problem of the hospital itself, which takes care of the child when it has first become seriously ill through accident or disease.

"This first period calls for orthopedic care and surgery under the most modern conditions so as to give the benefits of the great discoveries which medical science has made during the past few years.

"The second task in caring for the cripples is what can best be called 'after care,' in other words, the restoration of muscular function so that the child can eventually have an active and useful life. This period of after care may run not merely for weeks but even for many years.

"Finally, there is the third phase of functional work and in this is included not merely the teaching of a useful occupation but also the finding of work for the cripples to do when they are able to start in. Here again the task becomes that not of mass care but of looking after the individual. Every case is different from every other case.

"You carry on your work through local organizations in which every individual is a factor.

"Here is the opportunity not only on the part of the order as a whole to coordinate the work, to prevent duplication and to cooperate with other organizations, but there is even greater chance for the individual members to carry out the thought of doing one good turn daily, the chance to help the individual neighbor and to live up to the second great commandment.

"First and foremost, you are an American organization living up to the fundamentals on which our nation was founded. This has been amply demonstrated over many years.

"Your great aid to the country in times of war, your assistance in great disasters and now in time of peace, your assistance to scholarships, in the founding of university chairs for American history, your educational work for boy guidance, and your active welfare work in each and every one of the councils.

"Your activities have been a solid contribution to the welfare and prosperity of the country."

To Announce Parole Board.

ALBANY, N. Y., May 31 (AP).—Governor Roosevelt today returned to Albany, tanned and healthy after his month's vacation at Warm Springs, Ga. He paused here only seven minutes before going on to Schenectady, where he addressed the State Convention of the Knights of Columbus.

In those seven minutes, however, he said that in about ten days he would announce the appointment of three full-time commissioners to the Parole Board. This board, which will be independent of the Commission of Correction, will have charge of the parole and subsequent supervision of all criminals in State institutions.

Governor Roosevelt leaves today for Boston to attend the wedding of his oldest son, James, to Betty Cushing.

SAYS OUR ATTITUDE HALTS WORLD PEACE

Miss Starbuck Calls Us Aloof, Biased Toward Aliens and Too Nationalistic.

SEES FEAR OF ALLIANCES

Professional Women Oppose Bill to Restrict the Hours of Female Workers—Urge Naval Treaty.

The foreign policy of the United States and a prejudiced attitude and aloofness on the part of Americans toward the habits and customs of other nationalities were cited as deterrents to international understanding and peace yesterday at the convention of the Business and Professional Women's Clubs of New York State in the Hotel Virginia.

Miss Kathryn Starbuck, State chairman of the international relations committee of the club organization and Professor of Law at Skidmore College, Saratoga Springs, as critic of the American viewpoint in international relations, saw public opinion, in the last analysis, responsible for the lack of a consistent foreign policy. Discussing the conference plan as a new style of international relations, she said:

"This country is not consistent in accepting the conference idea as a dominant note in the new style of international relations when we try to combine it with the old fear of entangling alliances. That is fatal to any consistent foreign policy.

"If we are prejudiced and blind to the differences in other races and too lazy to see their point of view and too nationalistic to admit that our own country might be wrong in a particular instance, then we will never be able to use the machinery that has been built up for international peace.

"But, if as individuals, we take time to study international questions and acquaint ourselves with the historical and sociological backgrounds of other points of view, taking advantage of the opportunities we have to become acquainted with the peoples of other nations, we, as individuals, can make a real contribution toward a national psychology which will make for peace."

In the procedure of the Senate in ratifying peace and armament treaties Miss Starbuck saw "the voice of the people" playing a prominent part in the solution of "the complicated problem of international relations." She thought, however, that the London naval conference showed the present difficulties of the conference plan when our delegates proceeded cautiously for fear the Senate might not approve the pact. In view of this attitude she urged the club women to enlist the support of public opinion in some more definite action for better international relations.

A protest against the Mastick bill on the ground that the legislation restricted women employes in contracting on equal terms with men was contained in a resolution presented by Miss Grace L. B. Milligan, chairman of the resolution committee and adopted by the convention. The resolution also asked for a hearing on the bill before the State Department of Labor before any application of the legislation is made. Another resolution called for a survey of employment conditions among women over 40 and alleged discrimination against this class.

Other resolutions urged extension of vocational educations in public schools throughout the State, the extension of part time and continuation schools for employed students and a general increase of facilities for public education. Another resolution endorsed the work of the London naval conference and called on Senators Wagner and Copeland to support the treaty for adoption.

Miss Lena Madesin Phillips, national chairman of international relations, who presided at the convention luncheon, announced that an international federation of business and professional women would be formed at a conference of representatives from twelve nations at Geneva in the latter part of August.

Mrs. Helen Curtis Smith of Rochester, president of the State organization, was re-elected, as were all other officers with the exception of Miss Ruth C. Cole of Utica, recording secretary, who will be succeeded by Mrs. Daisy Knowlson of New York City. Miss Mildred Meade, Niagara Falls; Mrs. Ella Hemingway, Corning, and Miss Cole were elected directors, replacing Miss Anna M. Lorscheider, Rochester; Mrs. J. F. Barclay, Mount Vernon, and Miss Ella A. Laurence, New York City.

The annual dinner of the organization was held last night. A post convention executive meeting will be held this morning.

WEST SIDE POPULATION DECREASES ONE-THIRD

Third Assembly District Now Has 68,524, as Compared With 113,098 in 1920.

A loss of more than a third in population in the last ten years in the Third Assembly District, in the territory from Tenth to Fortieth Street on the west side, was shown by census figures made public yesterday. The loss is attributed to the changes in the section brought about through replacement of dwellings by office buildings and manufacturing establishments.

Census Supervisor Bruno B. Saloschin announced a total of 68,524, as compared with 113,098 in 1920. He also made public the census figures for the Seventh Assembly District, which is bounded by Central Park West, the Hudson River, Sixty-second and Eighty-third Streets. The present figures are 86,782, and ten years ago they were 85,486, the gain during the present census being very slight.

Mr. Saloschin said his office is now compiling the unemployment statistics. He said the figures would be made public during the week, and expressed the belief that the percentage of unemployed would not be more than 5 per cent. The supervisors have been obtaining their percentages of unemployed on the total population and not on the employable population.

Lester Friedman, supervisor of the downtown section, said he would have the census figures for several Assembly districts during the early part of the week. He also declared that the percentage of unemployed in the downtown section would not probably run more than 5 per cent.

George N. Jesse, supervisor of the Harlem section, declared it would be a week or more before the final figures for the twenty-fourth census district are available. He, too, stated that unofficial compilations of unemployment statistics indicate that about 4 per cent of those enumerated are out of work.

BYRD SHIPS FINISH LONG PACIFIC HAUL

Bark City of New York, 70 Days at Sea, Reaches Balboa in Tow of Eleanor Bolling.

MEN JOYOUSLY HAIL CHIEF

Admiral Will Sail With Them Tuesday on Last Leg of the Homeward Voyage.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BALBOA, May 31.—Two weary-looking little ships from Little America arrived here at the crossroads of America at 4:30 o'clock this afternoon when the bark City of New York, Admiral Byrd's flagship, towed by the steamer Eleanor Bolling, his supply ship, was sighted off the entrance to the Panama Canal.

It was the end of a hard struggle of almost seventy days across the Pacific with heat and bad weather more trying than battling the cold and ice of the Antarctic seas. Admiral Byrd is now happily reunited with the men of his expedition, and the last leg of the long voyage homeward is expected to begin when the ships clear Cristobal on Tuesday bound for New York.

If the ships reach their home port by June 19, as now planned, it will have been almost twenty-two months since they left New York bound for the great Antarctic adventure in exploration that took the leader over the pole from his base on the Ross Ice Barrier fringing the Bay of Whales.

When Admiral Byrd greeted the men aboard the City of New York today it was their first meeting since the ships sailed from Dunedin, N. Z., on March 23 and the reunion was a joyous one.

Admiral Byrd paid official farewell calls at Panama City and in the Canal Zone today and probably will go to Cristobal tomorrow preparatory to embarking on the City of New York Tuesday.

Hearty Greetings of Old Comrades.

The City of New York, battered and scarred from her battles with the ice-pack, pushed up to her pier at 6 P. M., tying up at the stern of the Bolling, which had dropped the tow twelve miles out and preceded her sister ship to port by half an hour.

Greetings from members of the expedition on the pier to their old comrades on the bark flew back and forth. "Hello, Bill!" "Hello, Taffy!" and "How do you like the weather?" they shouted.

Admiral Byrd waved and called greetings from the pier and was the first across the gangplank with his ever-present terrier, Igloo. He gripped the hand of every man he passed until he reached the cabin of Captain Melville. Warmly welcoming the skipper who had brought the expedition through the ice and piloted the bark from New Zealand, he said:

"Now I have them all together and they are all well. And you don't know how happy I am!"

After greeting every one on deck Admiral Byrd went down to the fireroom to see the stokers who had brought the ship to port and, when he returned, he said:

"Tonight it is hot up here, but down there it is 125 degrees."

After flashlights had flared for photographing Admiral Byrd with Captain Melville and Dr. Lawrence Gould, second in command of the expedition, the Admiral returned to his hotel, accompanied by the ship's master.

Approach of Sea-Weary Ship.

When the City of New York was first sighted off the fortified islands guarding the Canal, only her masts and upper crossarms were visible in the cloud of black smoke from her laboring engines. Then the masts grew taller and a decided list to larboard and stern was apparent.

With her sails furled and her lines black from smoke and her yardarms hanging listlessly, the bark made a picture of sea-weariness against the flaming sunset of the tropic sky. The list lifted the hull aslant and the red-painted bottom looked like a gash in the side of the ship. Then a nearer view revealed the scars of the ice battles, holes in the hull punched by ice cakes, and the sides splotched with the green growth of the tropic seas. Even the name on the port bow was partly obliterated and hardly visible.

Just before the ship ranged alongside the pier, the sudden tropical darkness fell, adding to her mysterious appearance. Then aboard was found an atmosphere that seemed to hold something of the spell of the Antarctic.

Touches of Conrad Aboard.

For the City of New York is a Conrad ship. And aboard her are such Conrad characters as Captain Melville, Bendik Johansen, the first mate and ice pilot, and Sverre Strom, the huge, taciturn Norse veteran of polar seas, who was the strongest man in the expedition.

"Well, we had quite a trip from New Zealand with all kinds of weather," Captain Melville said. "And then we ran out of coal. That forced us to depend solely on sail and, with the supplies stored on the larboard, the ship listed when the bunkers were emptied."

Dr. Francis D. Coman, medical officer of the expedition and chronicler of the bark's Pacific voyage, looked the picture of health himself and reported all on board well.

"All were well throughout the expedition," he said. "But the heat during our passage through the tropics has been much more trying than was the cold of the Antarctic. One could dress for cold and keep warm, but there was no way to escape the heat with the ship becalmed on the equator."

Dr. Coman added that the decks became so hot that it was difficult to walk on them at times out in the doldrums.

Start Canal Passage Today.

The City of New York is taking on enough coal tonight to take her through the canal and will finish bunkering at Cristobal. The Eleanor Bolling will start through the canal early tomorrow morning in order to have time for cleaning her boilers before starting northward.

The voyage home, which begins Tuesday, will be speeded by a three-day tow to be given the City of New York by the powerful Navy tug Scioto.

As soon as the City of New York and the Bolling were tied up and greetings were over, the men on both vessels began dressing to go ashore for reunion parties.

Admiral Byrd will probably go to Colon tomorrow night if both of his ships are to be through the canal by Monday.

Philadelphia Program Ready.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., May 31.—Rear Admiral Byrd's official welcome to Philadelphia after his return from Antarctica has been set for July 1, and Theodore F. Ash, general chairman of the committee in charge, today announced completion of the program.

After being met by the official reception committee, navy band and a battalion of marines and sailors, the explorer will be escorted to the Poor Richard Clubhouse for a reception.

Mayor Mackey, members of the City Council and a group of distinguished Philadelphians will meet the visitor in the rotunda of Independence Hall. Thousands of Philadelphians a few moments later will have an opportunity to see the Admiral in the square outside and to hear him speak.

GANG KILLER SLAIN, 3 SHOT IN CHICAGO

Philip Gnolfo, Two Other Genna Associates and a Boy Are Victims of Battle in Street.

FIVE ASSAILANTS ESCAPE

Attack Indicates That Efforts of Leader to Assume His Old Place Will Be Fought.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, May 31.—Philip Gnolfo, member of the old James Genna gang of "alcohol cookers" and professional killer, was shot to death today and two companions were wounded in an attack from ambush as they were riding in Gnolfo's car on a West Side street. In the hail of bullets Edward Zlaftos, a 14-year-old boy walking on the sidewalk, was struck and wounded.

The gangster's injured companions are Guili Carmelo and Joe Fianacca, both known to the police.

The attack took place in the heart of the "Valley" district on the outskirts of "Little Italy."

As the Gnolfo car was running on Peoria Street a black sedan suddenly swept out of a side street and sped alongside the other automobile, and at once revolver and shotgun fire poured into it from the weapons of five men. Then the attacking sedan roared away, leaving Gnolfo slain at the wheel of his own car.

As the Gnolfo automobile swerved from the street and crashed into a church Carmelo and Fianacca jumped out and ran up an alley to a home on Eighteenth Street, where they sought treatment for their wounds. The police found them hiding there. Neither was severely hurt.

The car containing the killers was last seen speeding northeast in Canalport Avenue. A sawed-off shotgun was found in a lumber yard a few blocks away, where it had apparently been thrown from the automobile.

Carmelo said he was from Toledo and Fianacca gave a Rochester (N. Y.) address. Each had been absent from Chicago since the disintegration of the Genna gang. They had brought to Chicago with them, they said, a cargo of olive oil and a shipment of men's shirts, with which they intended to go into business.

Gnolfo's record extended back to 1915, when he was wanted for murder in Greensburg, Pa. He was arrested many times in Chicago, but never convicted.

He was a friend of the slain Orazle Trope, known as "The Scourge." In 1926 an attempt was made to kill him, but Joseph Calabriese, riding in Gnolfo's car in the place usually occupied by the latter, was shot to death instead.

It was five years ago that James Genna fled to Italy to escape the death which had befallen his three brothers, Mike, Angelo and Tony, and his army of alcohol cookers had been disbanded.

A few weeks ago, Jim Genna reappeared in Chicago. Word reached police that the former gang leader intended to reassemble his forces and assume his old place. Today's attack indicates he will find his plans opposed.

PICKS GROUP TO STUDY JERSEY COMPENSATION

Blunt, Naming Representatives From Five Interested Fields, Says He Wants No "Whitewash."

Special to The New York Times.

TRENTON, N. J., May 31.—Colonel Charles R. Blunt, State Commissioner of Labor, named representatives of five interested groups today as an advisory commission to study and advise on changes deemed necessary in the workmen's compensation activities of the department.

Labor, manufacturers, insurance underwriters and the medical and legal professions each have a spokesman on the commission, the personnel of which is as follows:

THOMAS B. EAMES, first vice president, State Federation of Labor; recommended by Senator Arthur A. Quinn, president, State Federation of Labor.

WILLIAM S. LANDES, Newark, vice president, Celluloid Corporation; recommended by J. Philip Bird, chairman, New Jersey Industrial Council.

A. DUNCAN REID, Montclair, president, Globe Indemnity Company; recommended by James A. Beha, general manager, National Bureau of Casualty and Surety Underwriters.

Dr. J. B. MORRISON, Newark; recommended by Dr. Andrew F. McBride, president, State Medical Society.

MAXIMILIAN M. STALLMAN, Newark; recommended by Ralph Lum, president, State Bar Association.

Colonel Blunt said it was not desired "that the commission's conclusions be a coat of whitewash, but a picture of the entire subject in its true colors."

The operations of the compensation division, against which complaints as to irregular practices have been lodged, have been receiving Colonel Blunt's attention since he took office a year ago. The survey is expected to take several months.

OPEN WAY TO UNION OF PRESBYTERIANS

Cincinnati Assembly Delegates Adopt Plan and Send It to Session at Des Moines.

INCLUDE REFORMED CHURCH

Negotiations Are in Progress to Merge an Aggregate of 2,000,000 Communicants.

VOTE ON WOMEN GIVEN OUT

Their Ordination Is Denied, 109 to 171, and Their Election as Elders Granted, 160 to 120.

From a Staff Correspondent of The New York Times.

CINCINNATI, May 31.—A committee appointed by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America last year to negotiate a large merger of the separate branches of Protestantism using the Presbyterian form of government in this country, reported to the present General Assembly here today that it would be possible to prepare a plan of organic union immediately on the basis of their existing standards.

The General Assembly, as the ruling body of 2,000,000 communicants in the largest unit of the Presbyterian denomination in this country, thereupon unanimously authorized the committee, headed by the Rev. Dr. J. Ross Stevenson, president of Princeton Theological Seminary, to proceed with other bodies of Presbyterian and Reformed Churches, aggregating 1,000,000 communicants, or with any one of these bodies, "in the preparation of a complete plan for organic union to be submitted to the General Assembly."

Des Moines Assembly Notified.

A copy of this resolution was immediately dispatched by order of the General Assembly in Cincinnati to the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church of North America, now in session in Des Moines as the ruling body of about 250,000 communicants, with a message expressing the hope for a "cordial response."

The willingness of the United Presbyterian Church to proceed, according to Dr. Stevenson, has already been indicated by its action in calling a conference of Presbyterian and Reformed bodies in Pittsburgh last January to discuss the basis of union.

Dr. Stevenson reported, however, that negotiations between the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America and the Reformed Church in America, with 160,000 communicants, were even further advanced.

"As a result of discussions, also held in Pittsburgh last January," he informed the assembly, "tentative agreements were drawn up, indicating that the way is clear for a union of the two churches. Looking to this end, regional conferences are being held in the Reformed Church in America so that the matter may be presented to all consistories and classes prior to the meeting of the General Synod of that Church in June."

Reformed Church Also Brought In.

As to the Reformed Church considered separately, the General Assembly authorized its committee "to take up the preparation of a plan of organic union to be presented to the next assembly, provided the forthcoming synod of the Reformed Church votes affirmatively for union."

According to Dr. Stevenson the outcome should be the consummation of Presbyterian mergers within the next few years.

Dr. Stevenson introduced the Rev. Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, president of Union Theological Seminary, to describe the ceremony of consummating the union of churches in Scotland, at which the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America was represented by Dr. Coffin as a minister and Dr. John H. Finley as a ruling elder.

Drama of Scottish Union.

"The assemblies of the Established Free Church of Scotland and of the United Free Church met for the last time separately in their respective places on Oct. 1," Dr. Coffin said.

"Then the two Moderators led the assembled ministers and ruling elders out to meet in High Street. As the two Moderators shook hands, the watching crowd of tens of thousands broke into a Scottish hymn. The two Moderators led the way to St. Giles's Cathedral. There was a carefully prepared service with no sermon. The songs of the Scottish Church seemed to say all that was necessary."

Dr. Coffin declaimed the words of the hymn "God Alone Has Built Up Jerusalem," and interspersed his narrative by reciting other hymns sung that day. Then, reviewing the basis of the union with its "recognized liberty of opinion" in the required agreement in faith, he concluded:

"It was expressly put into the articles of union that 'this Church has the right to unite organically with any other Christian church in which the word of God is rightly preached and the sacraments duly administered,' so that there cannot be a possible complaint that the church had surrendered its identity.

"This was the most impressive part of the agreement—this great church, mistress in her own house, holding out her hand for union with every other Christian church throughout the world."

As to Other Merger Prospects.

Resuming the report of the prospect of merging other churches with the Presbyterian and Reformed bodies, Dr. Stevenson said the problems increased in range and complexity with the Protestant Episcopal and Methodist Episcopal Churches.

He explained that negotiations revealed that a basis of agreement with them must consider not only the Gospel of Christ but also the serial Gospel on which the respective communions may have made deliverance, such as those on temperance, the family and divorce, international relations, economic and industrial policies, Sabbath observance and the moral and religious instruction of youth.

In addition to the United Presbyterian Church of North America and the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America, he said that possibility of union seemed open with the Reformed Church in the United States with its 350,000 communicants.

He said some uncertainty had recently arisen about the Presbyterian Church in the United States, with 450,000 communicants, known generally as the Southern Presbyterian Church, because it separated on the sectional issues which led to the Civil War. But the Southern Assembly, he added, by a vote of 164 to 119, had finally put itself itself on record as unwilling to close the door to further discussion of the union question and named a committee to report in 1931.

Pending further discussion of the world movement, church union, Dr. Hugh T. Kerr, newly elected Moderator of the General Assembly, said:

"Union may be retarded, but Christian unity goes marching on."

As part of the program today the Assembly received the official reports of the vote of its 293 constituent Presbyteries on the proposal to change the Church constitution to admit women to ordination as ministers and to election as ruling elders.

The general result was announced unofficially some weeks ago in Philadelphia. The actual figures as formally canvassed today showed a denial of ordination to women by a vote of 109 to 171, although they granted the privilege to women of election as ruling elders by a vote of 160 to 120.

When the election of women as elders was announced and Moderator Kerr declared it was now "a part of the Convention of the Church," there was a scattering applause.

During the day the assembly was addressed by Governor Myers Y. Cooper, who spoke of the services of the Presbyterian Church to society as a whole. In conclusion he said:

"It seems to me that what this country needs is a responsible Christian parenthood. The penitentiary problem will be solved, if solved at all, in the church, home and school."

The assembled Presbyterian ministers will be distributed tomorrow among the pulpits of Cincinnati and the suburbs, where many temporary vacancies exist due to the absence of Baptist preachers at their own annual meeting.

United Presbyterians for Merger.

DES MOINES, Iowa, May 31 (AP).—The United Presbyterian Church of North America in annual assembly voted today to merge with five other Presbyterian denominations, the Northern and Southern Presbyterian churches, the Dutch and German Reformed churches and the Presbyterian Church of the United States.

Dedicates New Church Here Today.

Cardinal Hayes will dedicate this morning the new edifice of the Church of the Incarnation, St. Nicholas Avenue and 175th Street. The church, which is of granite and which cost $600,000, was built through the efforts of Mgr. Joseph F. Delany, its pastor for thirteen years. The cornerstone of the new church was laid by the Cardinal on Oct. 28, 1928.

BAPTISTS DEMAND FEDERAL FILM CHECK

Cleveland Convention Is Told Industry Should Be Controlled as 'Utility.'

CENSORSHIP "INADEQUATE"

Committee Advocates Inspection at the Source—Block Bookings Are Termed Evil.

Special to The New York Times.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, May 31.—Placing the motion picture industry under "government control as a public utility" for the moral protection of the American people is demanded in the report of the committee on resolutions of the Northern Baptist Convention, meeting in Public Hall here today.

The demand is included in the committee's report presented to the convention. It will be voted upon at one of the business sessions Monday.

"Blind booking" and "block booking" of films and "the absence of any public supervision of the production of silent and talking pictures at the source, as contrasted with the exercise of censorship after the pictures are produced," are referred to as evils.

The type of films exported from the United States to foreign countries is described as "in many instances having a decidedly evil effect upon our American relations with other countries."

The report says that 90 per cent of the motion picture audiences on Saturdays and Sundays are children and that expert testimony indicates that they are "receiving false and distorted views of life," their "sensitiveness to crime diminished" and their "standards of modesty and social control demoralized" by much of the material they see upon the screen.

The report commends the intent of the Brookhart bill (Senate bill 1,003) and the Hudson bill (House bill 9,986), both of which deal with some of the alleged conditions in the motion picture industry to which the committee report takes exception.

Indications today were that the convention would approve the moving picture section of the recommendations committee report with revision.

Several times during the reading of the report the clerk was interrupted by applause, as was the case during the reading of the section on prohibition and law enforcement.

The resolution on prohibition and law enforcement is practically a brief summary of the report of the committee on prohibition read Friday night.

In addition, the transfer of the enforcement of prohibition from the Treasury Department to the Federal Department of Justice is commended and appreciation expressed for the decision of the Canadian Government to refuse to license export of intoxicating liquors to the United States and other countries where the sale of liquor is prohibited.

The committee also urges the United States Government to assume leadership in all efforts looking toward world peace. A section of the long report on international justice and good-will, presented early in the convention, asking early ratification of the naval treaty on limitation of armaments is incorporated in the resolution, which also asks the Church's commission on social service to continue cooperation with agencies seeking the cause and relief of unemployment. This resolution offers no definite suggestion as to causes or methods of relief.

Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt, former Assistant United States Attorney General, arrived about noon. She was to address the convention banquet in the evening. A pageant, "The Triumph of Religious Liberty," with 1,200 actors, was to follow the banquet.

Delegates at the early morning business session accepted the invitation of Kansas City to meet there in 1931.

The Rev. Dr. Albert W. Beaven, president of Colgate-Rochester Divinity School at Rochester, was unanimously elected president of the convention, succeeding the Rev. Dr. Alton L. Miller.

ASSERTS CANNON ISSUE REMAINS UNDECIDED

Georgia Methodist Minister Says Question of Christian Ethics Is Involved.

MACON, Ga., May 31 (AP).—Dr. Bascom Anthony, for many years a leading Methodist minister of South Georgia, said in a letter published today that the real issue in the charges brought against Bishop James Cannon Jr. at the Dallas conference "has never been passed on its merits."

"A few of us are determined that it shall be if it is humanly possible," he added.

Dr. Anthony, who was superannuated as a presiding elder at the last general conference after fifty years' service, is considered by pastors of the South Georgia Conference an authority on church law. He still preaches on occasion and maintains his conference membership.

Dr. Anthony's letter, which was addressed to The Macon Telegraph, said in part:

"The criticism upon the action taken by the committee on Episcopacy in passing the character of Bishop Cannon and upon the general conference for re-electing him to head the Board of Temperance is, in my opinion, just.

"All the Georgia delegates except Doctors T. D. Ellis and W. F. Quillian voted against him. Unfortunately the Hoover-Smith, wet and dry question that seemed to overreach all else in the daily press, also seemed to have controlled the general conference.

"The whole question of Christian ethics is involved and every man who has an interest in the maintenance of Christian standards has a right to speak and ought to do so. The cause of temperance is involved and all its friends have a right to protest against its being jeopardized.

"In saying these things I am not attacking the character of the men who supported Bishop Cannon. Many of them are our best and truest men, but I do think that in their sympathy for a humiliated man, or in their zeal for prohibition, our great Church has received a hurt that will require the use of its lawful healing powers which inhere in its discipline and which I believe will be found to meet our needs."

LINER NEW YORK SPEEDY.

Makes 19.6 Knots in Crossing After Repairs to Engines.

The Hamburg American liner New York arrived yesterday morning from Europe, setting a time record for her three sister ships, which have been re-engined to give them more speed.

The Hamburg, which came out first, made an average speed of 19 knots and the Albert Ballin just a trifle under that figure. The New York averaged 19.6 knots, and Captain K. Graalfs, the master, said she would make 20 knots later.

The only one that has not yet crossed since having new turbines installed is the Deutschland, which left Cherbourg yesterday with a new captain on board, as Langer, the former master, has retired through ill health.

The New York brought 409 passengers and made the crossing in six days 16 hours and 51 minutes, Captain Graalfs said.

NEW POINT OF ORDER ON TARIFF REPORT

Barkley Will Move and Smoot Accept Four Original Rates Changed by Conferees.

INSURGENTS PLAN DELAY

Will Reorganize Coalition in Effort to Prevent Bill Going to Hoover This Month.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 31.—That another point of order will be sustained by Vice President Curtis on the first conference report on the tariff when it is raised next week by Senator Barkley of Kentucky against the rates on rayon, cheese, cherries and watches was predicted today by Senator Smoot, chairman of the Finance Committee. This obstacle will be quickly overcome by the conferees, Senator Smoot believes, and the report will be corrected to conform to the expected ruling.

According to Senator Smoot, there appears to be no doubt that the conferees exceeded their authority in increasing the rates on these items beyond the rates contained in either the Senate or House bill. This action, in his opinion, will compel Vice President Curtis to follow the precedent he set in his ruling on the flexible tariff clause in the supplemental report.

"The expected sustaining of points of order will not delay action on the conference report more than two days," Senator Smoot said. "The conference will quickly agree upon rates that fall within the limits of the two bills and report back to the Senate. As I see the situation now, the tariff bill will be sent to the President certainly by the middle of June, and with the assurance that the President will approve it the law will be in effect by July 1."

Insurgents Plan Further Fight.

Insurgent leaders are not so confident that the conference report will have such speedy and smooth sailing in the Senate. One predicted today that the report on the flexible tariff will be defeated and sent back to conference.

They are arranging for a resumption of their alliance with the Democrats, and are hopeful of causing some embarrassment to the Republican leaders and the probable modification of the flexible tariff provision.

"We think we can send the report back to the conference," one insurgent said, "but in the end the bill will be passed and approved by the President."

The insurgent forces apparently believe that the bill will become a law, but before it does they will not neglect any opportunity to condemn it and charge that it is an "iniquitous measure." This policy will be followed, they asserted, despite the demand from the farm sections and the industrial States for a prompt settlement of the tariff so that business may go forward under adjusted economic conditions.

Senator Smoot plans to call the conference on the flexible provision Monday, following Senate consideration of a motion to override the President's veto on the Spanish War pension bill. He has refused to act on the report, which contains the rates against which a point of order will be made, until the report on the flexible clause is disposed of, and this may occupy the Senate for ten days.

Retaliation Tariff Expected.

Retaliatory tariffs by half a dozen countries are expected. Already Canada has a temporary law which works against American importations and favors the free flow of products from the British Empire. France has retaliated against the heavy duty on lace by a duty on American automobiles, and other countries are expected to take similar actions.

Some Republican leaders feel that retaliatory tariffs are going to break down the effectiveness of the proposed law and that in the end American business will not get any great benefits from the new legislation.

This subject, which is giving the administration much concern, was discussed by Senator Thomas of Oklahoma, replying to statements in an interview by Senator Moses, who on his return from abroad pointed out the possibilities of such a danger to American producers.

Senator Moses is reported to have said that if the bill is enacted, "we may expect new tariff acts to be passed in London, Paris, Berlin and Rome," and that such acts "would not be in retaliation, but merely in imitation of the American policy."

Thomas Calls Picture "Impressive."

"If the Senator has been correctly quoted, and if the statements made are true, then what is the situation abroad today?" Senator Thomas asked.

"The picture is impressive. Some nations have already raised their tariff rates. Others are planning to act, not in retaliation against the Hawley-Smoot bill, but merely in imitation of such act.

City Prepares for Homeward Rush Today; Chill Continues With Coldest May 31 Here

The police and railroad officials announced yesterday that they had completed all arrangements to facilitate the return today of the thousands of holiday-makers who had left the city for the week-end. The exodus this year was reported to be much smaller than that of last year, but the police are not overconfident of restoring road conditions to normal before 2 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The decrease in the number of departures was attributed to the weather. Yesterday was the coldest May 31 in the annals of the Weather Bureau, it was announced when the mercury dropped to 45 degrees at 5 A. M. The previous low for May 31 was recorded in 1884, when the temperature reached 46 degrees. A continuation of the cold weather was promised for this morning, but it was said the mercury this afternoon would reach yesterday's average of 65 degrees.

Outbound traffic was exceedingly light yesterday, the railroads reported. The police said the congestion on the roads was not heavy, since the greater part of the exodus was completed by Friday night. Only 12,000 automobiles had passed through the Holland Tunnel by 4 P. M. yesterday, as compared with 28,788 for Friday and 22,672 for Thursday. Tunnel officials did not expect the figure to be increased greatly.

More than 30,000 automobiles are expected to return through the tunnel from New Jersey tonight, it was estimated.

All New York traffic policemen have received orders to report for duty one hour earlier than usual today. Many autoists are expected to return home early in the afternoon to avoid the rush.

The Long Island Railroad will put its Summer schedule into effect today, providing for nearly 100 per cent increase in the number of trains to and from Far Rockaway, Rockaway Beach and Long Beach, according to the officials.

Ten additional trains will be run by the Central Railroad of New Jersey to bring back the holiday-makers today. Twenty-three additional trains will be run by the Erie Railroad. Four extra ferry boats will be put into service to and from Staten Island. It is expected that 200 automobiles will return every hour from 4 P. M. until midnight.

Las Vegas Rushes Aid to Small Town Half Demolished by Twister.

LAS VEGAS, N. M., May 31 (AP).—A tornado which struck Wagonmound, N. M., 95 miles from here, late today was reported to have killed six persons and to have demolished half the community. Wagonmound has a population of about 1,200. Fire trucks have been dispatched to fight a fire reported to have broken out immediately after the twister had done its damage.

Ambulances were sent immediately and two carloads of American Legion members, accompanied by Mayor Thomas V. Gruger of Las Vegas, were preparing to leave at once.

The Santa Fe Railroad has sent a wrecking crew to the scene and Mayor Gruger tonight was trying to get in touch with Governor R. C. Dillon and the head of the State's National Guard to obtain military supplies for residents without shelter or food.

URGE GRACE ABBOTT FOR CABINET POST

Friends Advance Child Welfare Official as Successor to Secretary Davis.

ACTIVE IN LABOR BUREAUS

She Has Led Work of the Department for Women and Children for Thirteen Years.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 31.—Leaders in a new movement to put a woman in the Cabinet have advanced the name of Grace Abbott of Nebraska as successor to James J. Davis, Secretary of Labor, Republican nominee for Senator from Pennsylvania.

Miss Abbott has been chief of the Children's Bureau in the Department of Labor for nine years, succeeding Miss Julia Lathrop, who organized the bureau.

Miss Abbott was named director of the child labor division of the bureau in 1917. In that position she administered the first Federal child labor law. She also served as secretary of the welfare conferences with which the children's year campaign was concluded and of the children's commission of the first International Labor Conference. As chief of the Children's Bureau she has been responsible for the administration of the Sheppard-Towner maternity and infancy act, in cooperation with forty-five States.

One of the most important bureaus in the Department of Labor is that which deals with immigration. Miss Abbott was the first director of the Immigrants' Protective League of Chicago, organized in 1909, when she was rounding out the first of a seven-year residence in Hull House. The league aided newly arrived immigrants, secured employment for them and protected them from exploitation. Miss Abbott was responsible for the prosecution of several fraudulent labor agents and obtained a law for the regulation of employment agencies in Illinois.

She was appointed successively executive secretary of the State Immigration Commissions of Illinois and Massachusetts. Based on the experience of those years she wrote "The Immigrant and the Community," which is considered an authoritative book.

During the World War Miss Abbott was an adviser on the war labor policies board. In 1922 and 1925 she was the representative of the United States in a consultative capacity on the advisory committee on traffic in women and children of the League of Nations. She is the fifth woman in fifty years to be elected president of the National Conference of Social Workers.

Backers of Miss Abbott contend that all her training and work have been along the specialized lines which the Department of Labor includes. She has frequently appeared before Congressional committees as an authority on labor matters.

Miss Abbott was born in Grand Island, Neb., where her father, Othman A. Abbott, at the age of 88, is still living, having settled there after the Civil War, in which he served with the Ninth Illinois Cavalry. Her mother, whose family removed to Illinois from the Genesee Valley in New York, was Miss Elizabeth Griffin.

Miss Abbott graduated from Grand Island College and obtained a political science degree at the University of Chicago. She holds a labor union card as a member of the Federal Employes' Union, which is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

URGES COOPERATION ON LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

New Jersey Banker Suggests Conference to Adjust Their Differences Over Functions.

Special to The New York Times.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., May 31.—Conflict between building and loan associations and banking interests can be ended by a simple round-table conference on the question of how far the former group shall go in the banking field, it was declared today by Robert H. Harden of Westfield, vice president of the New Jersey Bankers' Association, in addressing the New Jersey League of Building and Loan Associations at Haddon Hall. Mr. Harden also advised the creation of substantial reserves to meet emergencies.

Mr. Harden said he came as an emissary of good-will from the bankers in view of recent misunderstanding of the activities of the building and loan group and attempts in the Legislature to correct supposed errors in operation.

"Many men in the building and loan associations feel reserves are not necessary," he said. "Building and loan associations stand in a preferred position. Their income is predetermined. Banks have irregular income, and especially in times of stress.

"Both groups can improve their situation by more open understanding and willingness to see the other's standpoint. Modern building and loan associations are doing banking business. As a practical suggestion, let the bankers and building and loan managers get together around a table locally and you will get better cooperation and improve business."

H. R. Coulomb of this city, vice president of the State Bar Association, urged cooperation between that organization and the league to obtain proper laws to safeguard the great business which has been built up.

CHAIN HOSPITALS VETOED BY GREEFF

Decides Plan as Proposed for 12 Queens Communities Is Not Practicable.

SUBMITTED IN FEBRUARY

Officer of Central Queens Allied Civic Council Urged Series of 100-Bed Institutions.

Dr. J. G. William Greeff, Commissioner of Hospitals, said yesterday that he had decided against the plan for twelve chain hospitals to be built throughout Queens, suggested to him by Otto Schuler, vice president of the Central Queens Allied Civic Council and chairman of that organization's hospital committee.

Mr. Schuler submitted his plan to the Commissioner of Hospitals last February and was advised that it was under consideration. Under the original recommendation, it was proposed that small 100-bed hospitals be built in Long Island City, Astoria, College Point, Bayside, Queens Village, Jamaica, South Rockaway, Woodhaven, Corona, Ridgewood, Maspeth and Glendale.

Later the plan was attacked on the ground that it was likely to prove expensive and uneconomical. Thomas F. Daly, a member of the board of directors of Mary Immaculate Hospital, Jamaica, contended that Jamaica was the natural medical centre for Queens and favored centralizing hospital facilities there. He asserted the plan would involve economic waste, make staffing difficult and fail to provide adequate facilities for the proper training of nurses and internes.

Mr. Schuler replied that the difficulties suggested could be overcome by operating the chain hospitals under the direction of the large 500-bed hospital already provided for on the tax note calendar.

"We concede that it will cost a little more to maintain five 100-bed hospitals than it would be to maintain one 500-bed institution," Mr. Schuler said at that time. "We feel, however, that many lives will be saved by bringing the hospitals closer to the people. We would recommend that on the same site on which the hospital now authorized and to be begun shortly is built, there be built a borough medical college where instruction could be given."

Dr. Grieff would not discuss the matter yesterday beyond saying that he had looked into it carefully and found it impracticable.

Dr. Schulman to Sail for Europe.

The Rev. Dr. Samuel Schulman, rabbi of Temple Emanu-El, will sail on the Berengaria on Tuesday for a two months' tour of Europe. He will be accompanied by Mrs. Schulman. In London he will address the World Union for Progressive Judaism. He is one of the founders of the movement.

DAWES STUDYING FAIR AT ANTWERP

Envoy Seeks Ideas at Belgian Exposition for One in Chicago in 1933.

STARTS HOME NEXT WEEK

Sir Henry Cole, British Expert on Exhibitions, Will Sail Home With Him.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ANTWERP, May 31.—"The mystery of why I am going home next week has been solved at last," General Dawes, United States Ambassador to Great Britain, said smiling today when he was spoken to while he was strolling through the Belgian Centennial Exposition grounds here.

General Dawes introduced his companion as Sir Henry Cole, until recently connected with the British Foreign Office as director of expositions and who, General Dawes explained, had resigned that position to go to America with him and assume direction of the international exhibitions at the Chicago World Fair in 1933. The purpose of their trip to Antwerp together is to collect ideas, which together they will use in preparing the Chicago exposition.

"There is absolutely no political significance to my trip home," General Dawes said, "but I keep hearing that my motives are concerned with the naval treaty or with the preparation of my alleged Presidential campaign. But the fact is that I have no political aspirations and have definitely abandoned politics. I am a statesman now and have no intention of ever seeking political office again.

"Sir Henry will sail with me next Saturday from Southampton, and we shall go direct to Chicago. I am taking the trip now chiefly because it is the moment when he can go with me."

General Dawes's visit here is entirely unofficial. He came here last night and spent most of today inspecting the Old Belgium exhibit, which is a separate feature of the Centennial Exposition.

The idea greatly pleased General Dawes, who said he intended to adapt it to the Chicago exposition and reproduce an American village of 100 years ago.

General Dawes and Sir Henry returned to London together this evening.

BERLIN HAILS HUTCHESON.

Dean of Juilliard School Gives First Concert There Since 1914.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, May 31.—Ernest Hutcheson, dean of the Juilliard music school in New York, gave a concert in the Bach Saal tonight. The tremendous enthusiasm of the audience obliged him to give more than a dozen encores.

Mr. Hutcheson, who formerly lived in Berlin, gave his last previous concert here in 1914. The audience included many prominent American and Berlin musicians.

OUR big, luxurious salon opened only yesterday, but did the twins miss a moment? Not they! Trust them to be on the spot whenever anything exciting happens. They investigated all the booths—said the wall paper was "perfectly stunning"—adored the colorful, comfortable modern furniture—thought the Children's Barber Shop "too lovely and spacious for words". And they were so well pleased with our efforts at "making them beautiful" that they said we'd be seeing them every week.

Of course, Winnie's letting her hair grow, but she thought it looked a bit "shaggy" after her permanent, so she had some of the precious ends snipped. Which turned it into one of the most fetching long bobs in New York. First cut, 1.00. Trim, 75c. Children's, 50c.

"Iced tea or lemonade?" was what the maid asked Babs while the dips were getting into shape. When they found it is to be served every afternoon between 2 and 5:30, the twins agreed that "getting beautiful" at Best's is just like a party.

Babs is just as fussy about her nails as she is about her waves. She likes them "not too long, not too pointed and not too pink." Our girls are used to satisfying all such whims, and Babs declared herself suited to a T. Manicures, 75c.

"Too utterly relaxing," was the way Winnie described the big, comfortable facial chair. When she got through, her face was even more glowing and sparkling than ever. She said she felt 10 years younger—which makes her practically 8!

106 HURT IN CHARGE AT INDIAN SALT RAID

Cavalry Scatters Dharasana Mob When Police Staves Fail to Halt Attacks.

VICEROY'S DECREES HAILED

Nationalists Say New Rulings Will Help Them Fill Jails—Both Sides Ready for Wadala Raid Today.

BOMBAY, May 31 (AP).—The casualty list resulting from raids by Indian nationalists on government salt deposits was swelled by 106 names at Dharasana today. Plans were made for a huge "final raid" on the Wadala salt works tomorrow.

British cavalry charged to break up an attack on the salt pans at Dharasana, where similar raids have occurred almost daily for two weeks. Nationalist volunteers numbering 156 had started for the pans and been driven back several times by the sticks of foot police, following a warning each time. Finally the mounted troops charged.

To stem the movement on Wadala tomorrow the government has massed police and troops around the area. Nationalist leaders have answered that by making additional plans and urging Indians to "join the raid in their thousands and make it a phenomenal success."

Woman Jailed at Lucknow.

Lucknow, the historic city where fierce rioting took place earlier this week, still was under military surveillance today. One woman leader of the trouble, Mrs. Mitra, was sentenced to six months' simple imprisonment for leading a procession to Hajratgunj.

Nationalist leaders were unperturbed by the Viceroy's two new ordinances, directed against inciting to non-payment of taxes and against picketing and tampering with the loyalty of government servants. Native leaders say enforcement of the ordinances would provide a new field for activities of the volunteers, since the object of the Nationalist campaign is to fill government jails. Six months in prison, a fine or both are the penalties for violating the new decree.

Women Nationalists have been picketing liquor shops since Mahatma Gandhi opened his campaign March 12, and said they would continue.

Picketing of foreign cloth ships was intensified here today, while the government issued a communiqué to counteract the propaganda against British cloth. Leaflets which had been distributed through the city said that the fat of cows, bullocks and buffaloes—sacred to the Hindus—is used to size the cloth in Manchester mills. The official communiqué asserted that only mutton fat is used.

Recalls Sepoy Mutiny.

The propaganda recalled the famous Sepoy mutiny of 1857. One of the causes of that trouble was a rumor that cartridges issued to the Sepoys had been greased with cow fat.

The Bombay Cotton Brokers' Association today ruled that transactions in the cotton crops of 1930 and 1931 shall be postponed indefinitely.

British authorities at Sholapur today defeated an ingenious plan of Nationalist volunteers to defy the martial law edict banning flying of the all-Indian national congress flag in the city.

Three men entered the town dressed in green shirts, red stockings and white caps—the three colors of the congress flag. The authorities soon noticed them, and, stripping them of their colors, gave them ordinary white Indian dress, and sent them back by the next train to Poona, where other Nationalist volunteers were waiting to proceed to Sholapur.

Dacca, a Bengal city not far from Calcutta, is in a disturbed condition from the communal riots between Hindus and Moslems that have gone on since last week. Various minor disorders were reported today. Hindu shops have been closed and many Hindus are leaving the city in panic.

A magistrate of Mannargudi, Madras Presidency, today meted out sentences to 132 Nationalist volunteers arrested yesterday for being members of an unlawful assembly.

The Nationalist leader Ramachandran was sentenced to a year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine of 500 rupees. Ninety-five volunteers and a doctor were sentenced to a year's rigorous imprisonment. Five were discharged after expressing regret, and the others were ordered sent for two years to a reformatory.

DENY OVERTURES TO GANDHI

London Sources Say Premier Has Sent No Representative to India.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, May 31.—An emphatic denial was issued at the India Office today to a statement made in New York by Sailendra Nath Ghose, president of the Indian National Congress of America, that Premier MacDonald had offered Mohandas Gandhi a settlement involving dominion status for India.

It was also stated there was no truth in Mr. Ghose's statement that an envoy from the Prime Minister is now in India to negotiate a settlement with the revolutionary leaders.

INDIA ARMY AIDE IN LONDON.

General Chetwode Regards Troops as Adequate for Any Emergency.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, May 31.—While police and troops were awaiting fresh disturbances at the Wadala salt works near Bombay, it was revealed that General Sir Philip Chetwode, Chief of the India General Staff, is now in London in connection with the present crisis. General Chetwode has been nominated to succeed Sir William Birdwood in November as Commander-in-Chief of the British troops in India.

He is here for a fortnight, ostensibly on leave, but is discussing the military situation in India with government authorities. The question of reinforcements has been touched upon, but General Chetwode is said to regard the present forces in India as adequate to deal with any emergencies.

Storms Fell 1,000,000 Banana Trees

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOGOTA, Colombia, May 31.—Wind storms this week destroyed a million banana trees, resulting in a loss of 300,000 pesos (the peso is worth 97.33 cents at par), according to a dispatch to El Tiempo today from Santa Marta. The damage was chiefly in the Orihueca district.

Vatican City Sets Up Tariff; Tobacco Price Up 75 Per Cent

By The Associated Press.

VATICAN CITY, May 31.—Dwellers in Vatican City who previously have enjoyed relatively cheap tobacco will smoke at dearer rates beginning Monday.

The new Vatican City customs duties, effective next week, increase the price of tobacco 75 per cent.

Prior to the treaty of Feb. 2, 1929, by which Italy recognized the temporal power of the Popes, the latter as sovereigns had never ceased to claim the right of collecting tolls. From 1870 until the Lateran Treaty no tariff was exacted, but certain articles were prohibited from entering the grounds of the Vatican.

Tobacco, matches and playing cards may not enter Italy in any circumstances, as they are government monopolies. Whether these commodities consigned to the Vatican State may now cross Italian territory under seal and enter the new Papal dominion on the payment of the Papal tariff is a question that has not yet come up. In the circumstances the foregoing dispatch probably refers to Italian fabricated tobacco.

CONGRESS OF BUILDERS FOR RATIONALIZATION

London Resolutions Also Call for Improvement of Standing of Public Works Contractors.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, May 31.—An appeal to builders and public works contractors throughout the world to study methods of rationalization and to all architects to apply these principles, so that all parts of trade and the community may ultimately benefit, was made at the conclusion of the International Building Trades Congress here yesterday.

John W. Harris of the Hegerman-Harris Company and Colonel William A. Starrett of Starrett Brothers, Inc., were among the dozen United States delegates to the congress, which convened as much for the exchange of private views on the parlous condition of the building trade in all countries as for passing resolutions. One resolution was to the effect that the respective federations of building and public works contractors should carry on appropriate and continuous propaganda for improving their standing, and in particular recommended that individual members of the federation avail themselves of the lien facilities accorded to contractors by law in certain countries. Another resolution dealt with the construction of workers' houses. It was recommended that any action taken by States or local governing bodies should not be such as to prevent or discourage private enterprise from providing as many houses as possible or place private enterprise at a disadvantage compared with agencies supported by public funds.

SWEDISH GOVERNMENT IS EXPECTED TO RESIGN

Ekman Likely to Succeed Premier Lindman After Parliament's Defeat of Grain Tax Bill.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

STOCKHOLM, May 31.—Sweden found itself confronted with a political crisis tonight when, after a turbulent debate, Parliament rejected the grain tax bill proposed by the Conservative Cabinet of Premier Lindman. As a result it is taken for granted that Premier Lindman will submit his resignation to King Gustaf on Monday or Tuesday and be succeeded by a Liberal Cabinet headed by former Premier Ekman.

While the government proposed to aid agriculture by an increased import duty on foreign grain, the opposition parties favored making the millers mix a certain proportion of Swedish grain with each unit of foreign produce.

The government's plan was rejected by the First Chamber, 75 to 55, while in the Second Chamber the debate was still continuing at midnight. A division on one point, however, showed which way the wind was blowing and indicated the government's defeat.

ITALY CELEBRATES TODAY.

Military Ceremonies to Mark Granting of Sardinian Constitution.

ROME, May 31 (AP).—The Feast of the Statute, commemorating the grant of a constitution by King Charles Albert of Savoy to his Sardinian subjects in 1848, will be celebrated tomorrow by a full dress review of the entire Roman garrison, horse, foot and artillery.

Similar military ceremonies will be held in all garrison towns of the kingdom, one of the most noteworthy being at Turin, for years the principal northern depot of the army and seat of the War College. There Crown Prince Humbert, as colonel of the 92d Infantry, will personally lead his men past the reviewing stand.

The military formations will be made the occasion for the distribution of medals, some belated war awards and others for peacetime services in emergencies when the army has been called on. Decorations for civic valor will be bestowed by the civil authorities in separate ceremonies.

Public buildings will be festooned with flags and electric lights. The Romans will have a fireworks display on the Pincian Hill.

GOLD STAR GROUP VISITS PARIS TOMB

Fourth Body of Americans Now Will See French Graves of Their Sons.

TWO WOMEN RECOVERING

Another Taken to Sanitarium, but Will Be Able to Rejoin Her Party in a Few Days.

PARIS, May 31 (AP).—More than 250 Gold Star mothers of the United States, the fourth group to land, today paid tribute at the Arc de Triomphe to France's Unknown Soldier before beginning their trip to the battle cemeteries.

Mrs. Eliza Wilson of Detroit, Mich., and Mrs. M. L. Smeaton of Fall River, Mass., acted for their comrades in the ceremony at the tomb, placing two wreaths on the memorial, which after yesterday's observance and previous visits of delegations is nearly hidden in blossoms.

Quartermaster General B. Frank Cheatham, U. S. A., and a number of French civilian and military dignitaries were present.

After the brief ceremony the mothers went to a restaurant in the centre of Paris for tea, where they were guests of honor with Walter E. Edge, American Ambassador, who, with Colonel Richard Tellis and General Bucant, spoke briefly to them.

A bulletin issued today from Gold Star headquarters said that Mrs. Margaret A. Price of Hiteman, Iowa, had been removed from her hotel to a sanitarium near Paris suffering from a nervous trouble. Medical officers said she would rejoin her party again in a few days.

Mrs. Florence Williams of Portsmouth, Ohio, who has been in a grave condition at her hotel at Verdun from bronchial pneumonia, was pronounced by her doctors today as out of danger and improving rapidly.

Mrs. Florence Reynolds of Damascus, Ohio, who has been ill at the American Hospital here, has almost recovered. She will join one of the new groups Monday or Tuesday. She came with the second party of mothers to arrive in France and was stricken the day after her arrival and has not yet visited her son's grave.

German-Rumanian Trade Talks Off.

BUCHAREST, Rumania, May 31 (AP).—German-Rumanian trade convention discussions today reached a deadlock and were declared off. This situation was declared by experts to be tantamount to a declaration of a trade war.

POPE PIUS AT WORK ON HIS 73D BIRTHDAY

He Gives Audiences to Hundreds, Including 30 From Mexico—Congratulations Pour In.

VATICAN CITY, May 31 (AP).—The Osservatore Romano today published a long article congratulating the Pope upon his seventy-third birthday and treating admiringly his remarkable activity and flourishing health, which, it says, permits him to engage in incessant work which might well break down a much younger constitution.

This evening Maestro Fernando Germani, organist of Augusteo, will give a concert of sacred music in celebration of the birthday anniversary.

Today differed little from other days in the Pontiff's busy life. His private secretary entered his presence every other minute with a telegram of congratulation. In all other respects the Pope seemed, if anything, to have more than the usual amount of work to do.

He gave audiences to several hundred persons, including thirty pilgrims from Mexico. He approved plans for the decoration and illumination of St. Peter's on the occasion of the canonization of the Canadian martyrs.

SOVIET STILL SEES POLISH WAR MENACE

Izvestia Fears Military Group in Warsaw May Choose Adventure to Save Itself.

SPEAKS TO WORLD OPINION

Russian Government Organ Says Polish Paper's Talk of an Independent Ukrainia Is an Affront.

By WALTER DURANTY.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MOSCOW, May 31.—Soviet opinion continues greatly exercised over alleged Polish war plans. The latest "provocation" on the part of Poland is a recent editorial in the Polish Gazette, semi-official organ of the Polish Government, which speaks quite openly about the advantages from the point of view of Polish security of an independent Ukrainia.

Izvestia, official organ of the Soviet Government, commented yesterday:

"It is an outrage that a newspaper known to represent the views of the Polish Government should speak thus about dismemberment of the Soviet Union, with which Poland claims to be on friendly terms."

And today Izvestia discusses Russo-Polish relations in its leading editorial, headed "The Polish War Program." This editorial has especial interests, because for the first time it explains bluntly just why the Soviet fears a Polish attack. The military clique now ruling Poland has reached an impasse, says Izvestia. That clique, the Soviet paper says, is quite incapable of solving the economic and financial problems of Poland, especially as the financial problems of Poland were much complicated if not primarily caused by the vastly excessive military expenditures.

Consequently, says Izvestia, the "Colonels' Government," as the Soviet paper terms the dominant group in Warsaw, now faces this alternative—either it must admit impotence and quit or attempt a military adventure against the Soviet Union. Izvestia admits, somewhat grudgingly, that the national interests of Poland and an influential section of the Polish community are opposed to a war in which, they declare, Poland would have more to lose than gain.

This, however, Izvestia argues, may be outweighed by a decision of the "Colonels" to stake all on a war card rather than admit incapacity to govern. Izvestia concludes by giving three reasons why it continues to insist upon war danger—first, to inform the Soviet masses that danger exists; secondly, to keep that section of Polish opinion which has "not lost all sense of reality" alive to the immediate risk that its military government may lose its head and embark on a policy of adventure; thirdly, to acquaint public opinion of Europe and the rest of the world with the facts about the grave menace to peace which Poland constitutes in the present circumstances.

DOLES GIVE GERMANY $180,000,000 DEFICIT

Finance Minister Admits Budget Is Upset and Fears Unemployment Will Grow.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, May 31.—A further slump in the condition of the Reich's finances was admitted today by Paul Moldenhauer, Minister of Finance, when he informed the Reichstag's budget commission that the continuing falling off of Federal revenues from taxes, customs duties, domestic imports and the concomitant rise of unemployment doles had completely thrown out of balance the government's carefully calculated budget of a month ago.

Confronted with a visible deficit of $180,000,000 for the current fiscal year, the Minister frankly admitted that the budget computation was based on the assumption that the immediate future would not still further complicate the government's calculations, which apparently rested on the assumption that the Spring business situation would improve both in respect to recession of unemployment and steady flow of revenues. Neither prospect has materialized and the government's spokesman today frankly admitted that the previous official estimates had sadly gone awry.

Dr. Moldenhauer now believes it will be necessary to provide support for the "normal" army of unemployed of 1,600,000 persons in the current budget, whereas the present number of jobless men and women is well in advance of 2,000,000.

The steady drain of unemployment doles alone has upset the Minister's earlier calculations by $150,000,000 and there is no assurance that the doles will not make still heavier demands on the government.

Labor leaders held a conference today with Adam Stegerwald, the Federal Minister of Labor, to impress on the government the urgency of adopting economic relief measures. The primary cause of the depression, the labor leaders argued, was to be found in false measures of nationalization, in tariff policies which increased the cost of living and ruthless suppression of foreign credits to promote building and other enterprises which would automatically absorb the unemployed.

Dr. Stegerwald replied that $1,500,000,000 would be required to provide work for 2,000,000 men, a sum which he said no government could raise. He said he soon would seek the Reichstag's approval for measures calculated to give work to 150,000 unemployed.

JUNE

We look forward to Summer with its emphasis on freedom in dress, its comfort, its incentives to travel and change of habitat. It's a great season!

And particularly do we enjoy the entrancing new things for warmer weather that are pouring daily into the store—soon to find their way to country castles, cottages, cabañas, for gay, informal days to come.

These new frivolities and inventions please us, because they reflect so well the joyousness of June, because they are so assured in form and quality—and because they are in the Altman Manner.

URGES SINGLE LAW ON SEA FOR WORLD

British Delegate Voices Ideal While Presiding at Maritime Parley in Copenhagen.

AMERICAN TILTS WITH DANE

Commander Lee Defends Shipping Subsidies—A. P. Moller Replies by Quoting Lincoln.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

COPENHAGEN, May 31.—An ideal of one sea law for the whole world was one of the aims expressed by W. A. Soutar, one of the British delegates, who presided at the opening of the annual Baltic and International Maritime Conference here yesterday.

Mr. Soutar said the conference, at which twenty-one nations are represented, welcomed all steps which brought the nations closer together and, indeed, that the shipping community had taken a leading part in promoting international legislation.

The recent convention on safety of life at sea, Mr. Soutar added, was an evidence of international harmony but had advanced still further the steps already voluntarily taken for the humanitarian purpose of insuring safety and which in a generation had reduced loss of life at sea by half and had almost halved the cost of insurance of vessels.

The present load line conference sitting in London, Mr. Soutar continued, marked another stage in the progress of the unification of sea law, and he ventured the hope that the conference would reach a unanimous agreement fixing load lines for all vessels, including special load lines for timber-laden vessels and oil tankers so that in all countries and all ports the same regulations would be observed.

He asserted shippers would have to go back as far as 1882 to find a period of depression similar to the present one. He considered it more than a coincidence that the last depression occurred twelve years after the Franco-German War and this period twelve years after the World War. "Laid-up tonnage," Mr. Soutar said, "is useless. We must start rationalization and do away with obsolete ships when they are over 25 years old."

During a debate that followed A. P. Moller, Danish ship owner, sharply attacked Commander E. Lee, American delegate, over the United States shipping subsidies. Commander Lee defended the practice, saying State support was an absolute necessity. Mr. Moller retorted in the words of President Lincoln, "You can't fool all the people all the time."

Next year the conference will be held in Italy.

$750,000 WILL CHALLENGED.

Brothers in Ecuador Accused of Forging Document.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

GUAYAQUIL, Ecuador, May 31.—Alejandro Gallo, a wealthy planter, who died on May 16, left 1,500,000 sucres (nearly $750,000 at par) to the government for founding an agricultural college, according to a will which has been recorded.

This will has been contested, however, by Señor Gallo's brothers, who offered one that is challenged as a forgery. The second testament purports to divide the fortune among relatives.

The brothers are accused of having acted with the connivance of a justice of the peace named Naranjo, a registrar named Mejia and two witnesses, who are now in jail. Warrants are out for the arrest of Carlos Bermeo, former consul at New Orleans and now head of the Banco Comercial, and for R. D. and Manuel Gallo.

NANKING ABANDONS CHANGSHA TO REBELS

be consolidated at Tangshan, a village fifty miles west of Suchow.

Dispatches from Amoy today said thousands of residents were fleeing from Changchow, fearing an attack by Red troops was imminent.

All Nanking officials there were reported to have resigned under Communist pressure, and missionaries were ready to flee in the event of a Red attack. Part of the government troops garrisoning the city deserted to join the Reds, whose troops practically isolated the city by digging trenches across roads and cutting telegraph lines.

One dispatch said the Communists had kidnapped the Chinese agent of the Standard Oil Company of New York at Changchow, holding him for a ransom of $7,500.

Refugees from Changchow, practically surrounded by the threatening troops, were heading toward Amoy.

Bandits and Communists today were reported to be overrunning the countryside around Shasi, Hupeh Province, an important port on the upper Yangtse.

British authorities considered the situation at Shasi critical and sent a gunboat to evacuate British nationals there.

Fifteen hundred marauders attacked an American steamer at Shasi, wounding three Chinese members of the crew. The bullets of the attackers battered the ship severely before she escaped.

SHIPS FAIL TO CONFIRM VLADIVOSTOK REVOLT

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SHANGHAI, May 31.—While steamers arriving here from Vladivostok report all was quiet there when they left, rumors are circulating in Sino-Russian circles here of a White uprising at Vladivostok.

The rumors are to the effect that the crews of two Soviet warships in the harbor revolted and captured Russian Island, which is used by the Soviet as a detention camp for political prisoners. The island is ten miles from Vladivostok.

The reports say 5,000 prisoners liberated by the revolt reached the mainland and started an uprising in the city, where a new government was proclaimed. Usually well-informed Russian circles are unable to confirm these reports, which find credence in Chinese and White Russian newspapers.

The latter tell of riots in the Siberian area known as the maritime provinces, where the peasants are said to be suffering from a new campaign against the Kulaks (richer peasants), and a lack of food caused by the new policy. The Chinese semi-official news agency tonight reports several cases of riots and a hold-up of a transsiberian freight train near Nikolsk in which peasants looted the cars carrying food. Workmen in the Suchan coal mines near Vladivostok are said to have gone on strike to force the government to provide them with food.

WORLD FUR SHOW OPENS AT LEIPZIG

Most Complete Display of Kind Ever Assembled Depicts All Branches of Industry.

AMERICA HAS BIG EXHIBIT

Movies Bring Action in the Wilds to the Exposition, Which Also Includes Hunting Section.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LEIPZIG, May 21.—The International Fur and Hunting Exposition was officially opened here today. The exhibits include virtually everything relative to the industry, and the display as a whole is the most complete ever assembled.

A total of 5,000 square feet in "Hall of the Nations" at the exposition has been taken by the United States Departments of Commerce and Agriculture in a joint exhibit depicting the preservation, breeding and trapping of the leading fur-bearing animals of the United States and giving statistical information on the size of the American fur industry and the methods by which it is carried on.

One feature which is winning the first attention of spectators is a clock bearing this legend:

"For every tick of the clock two skins are obtained—one to be imported, one to be exported, and $16 worth of fur is sold at retail."

Beaver, otter, muskrat, skunk, opossum and seal are shown in separate groups arranged in the native habitats.

In the case of seals, charts indicate the cooperative seal-hunting agreements on the Pribiloff Islands among the United States, Canada, Russia and Japan. This exhibit is in charge of Frank G. Ashbrook of the Department of Agriculture.

One of the most interesting features of the exposition is a series of special films showing the trapping and hunting of fur-bearing animals in all parts of the world. The Russian films describing the industry in the wilds of Siberia are particularly interesting and the scenes in Canadian woods run a close second. London fur auctions and Leipzig dressing and dyeing plants also are shown on the screen with ample explanatory matter on how one of the world's largest international industries is conducted. The adventures of a Russian sable skin, for example, are depicted from trapping through skinning, drying, shipping and sale at a London auction, dressing and finishing in Leipzig, and finally appearing as a collar coat delighting a woman's heart in a New York furrier's shop.

The hunting exhibits contain a variety of valuable trophies from collections of famous Old World hunters, including the former King August of Saxony. There is also a collection of paintings of animals. This includes a number of African paintings done by Wilhelm Kuhnert, widely considered the finest contemporary painter of animals. Guns, old and new, boar spears, humane traps, old scales used in weighing trophies and many extraordinarily fine antlers are some of the features of this exhibition.

An animal park where living specimens of the principal fur-bearers of all countries will be shown has not yet opened owing to the German law requiring all imported animals to be quarantined for a certain period.

The exposition will be further enlivened from time to time throughout the Summer by riding tournaments, dog shows, mannequin parades and sports meetings.

PARIS PERMITS PLANES TO LAND IN WEST INDIES

Accord Allows Americans to Fly Over Guiana, Martinique and Guadeloupe.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, May 31.—The American Embassy announced today that the French Government has accorded temporary permission for American planes to fly over and land in the French colonies of Guadeloupe, Martinique and Guiana. The authorization is renewable quarterly and is subject to the American companies' observing the customary regulations of the territories concerned.

Since the difficulties arose several months ago Ambassador Edge and the aeronautical advisers attached to the embassy have had several conversations with responsible French officials. Though the French were disposed to facilitate an accord, they made it clear that France, too, had air lines in South America and must, therefore, act in a manner to protect her own interests. While the embassy communiqué does not mention it, there is reason to believe certain reciprocal rights are implied in the temporary understanding.

The solution announced today removes a serious obstacle to the smooth operation of air lines between North and South America, since any form of restriction upon American planes flying over Martinique, French Guiana and Guadeloupe would have been a drawback to the successful maintenance of through schedules. The temporary character of the air agreement is not as satisfactory as American air line officials had hoped, but, it is understood, when the question of landing facilities for the French South American air line between Cayenne and Natal, Brazil, has been determined, the Franco-American agreement will be made permanent.

Some reports have given the impression that the French Air Ministry, which gives its official support to all international air lines having their termini in France, had in mind the establishment of a New York-Natal link to the present air line connecting France with South America, thus establishing a Paris-Natal-New York air line. The strategic qualities of the French colonial possessions involved in today's agreement would have proved a great advantage to such a line, especially if all other competitors had been denied landing privileges. But if any such scheme was even contemplated it would now seem to have been abandoned.

American Missionary Escapes Duel With Bolivian Official

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LA PAZ, Bolivia, May 31.—Carl Bell, principal of an American Methodist school in this city, recently was challenged to a duel by the general director of the Bolivian army band.

Pupils of all schools had been called together for a general patriotic song rehearsal, but Mr. Bell, after waiting for the appearance of the musical director for more than an hour with some 500 pupils out of doors on a cold day, ordered the children to return to school. Much to his surprise and amusement, he learned the next day that his action had been taken as a personal offense by the musical director, who challenged him to a duel.

The matter was peacefully settled between Mr. Bell and the seconds of the challenger when Mr. Bell explained that no personal offense was intended.

CUBA ROUNDS UP REDS.

Five Arrested in Raid Uncovering Evidence of Activities by Women.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

HAVANA, May 31.—With the arrest Thursday of members of a secret association operating in Havana to spread Soviet propaganda, and the subsequent investigations made by the secret police, the evidence shows that women have been employed by the Communists here, and that a Chinese subject delegated by Moscow is acting as an adviser to the local Reds and as a translator of correspondence from Russia.

In a raid yesterday, five men of various nationalities were arrested, charged with conspiring against law and order. They are being held without bail. Proclamations of a seditious nature were seized, as were documents attacking the Cuban Government and declaring a state of rebellion against the constituted powers.

Among the men held is John Rego, a delegate from Cuba to the Communist session at Moscow last year.

KOREAN REDS BOMB JAPANESE BUILDINGS

Bands Set Fire to Consulates and Schools in Chientao District of Manchuria.

POLICE REPEL THE RAIDERS

Japanese Officer Wounded in Exchange of Shots—Railway Bridge Is Damaged.

Tokyo, May 31 (AP).—A band of Korean Communists swept down on the Chientao district of Kirin Province, Manchuria, early today, said a Rengo news agency dispatch from Seoul, Korea, bombing and burning Japanese consulates and buildings and schools of the Korean Association.

The raids were directed against centres of Japanese influence in Yenki, Lung Ching-tsun and other towns of the Chientao district. The Chinese military and Japanese police united to drive out the invading bands, composed of Koreans hostile to the Japanese régime in Korea.

One Japanse consular policeman was wounded in the exchange of rifle fire. All of the invaders were believed to have escaped. No arrests were reported.

Lung Ching-tsun apparently bore the brunt of the Communists' activity. Crude bombs were thrown into the office of the Oriental Development Company, and the electric light plant was put out of commission. There were no casualties, however.

A light railway bridge over the Tumen River was set afire and damaged.

In order to prevent border troubles Japan maintains consulates in several large towns of Chintao. Each of these consulates is staffed with police. It is their duty to watch Korean malcontents. Japanese influence also is exercised through the Japanese fostered Korean Association, Japanese fostered schools for Koreans and the Japanese owned Oriental Development Company for the operation of several electric light plants.

REPORTS CANCER RELIEF.

Dr. Freund of Vienna Says Treatment Has Proved Efficacious.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

VIENNA, May 31.—A sensational report concerning the alleged success of a cancer treatment upon which he has worked for twenty years was made by Professor Freund, well-known cancer specialist, at a meeting last night of Viennese surgeons.

Dr. Freund said he had established after long research that human intestines contain two species of bacteria, one furthering and the other destroying cancerous growth. While in the intestines of healthy people the former type of bacteria dominates, the latter type has the upper hand in cancer subjects, he said.

Dr. Freund's treatment consists in giving patients medicaments containing anti-cancerous bacteria and their products. The treatment resulted in many cases of sudden improvement in patients and considerable retrogression in the cancerous tumors.

Professor Breitner, head of the Vienna Rudolf Hospital, where Dr. Freund works, fully confirmed Dr. Freund's statemnet. Dr. Breitner quoted an example where one patient suffering from severe pain as a result of cancer was relieved of all suffering soon after the treatment started. In many other cases the cancers became smaller and even disappeared.

SPANISH AIRMAN RELEASED.

Sahara Tribesmen Deliver Him to Gunboat—No Ransom Asked.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MADRID, May 31.—Commander Burguete, one of the Spanish aviators forced down in the Sahara more than a week ago, was taken to the gunboat Canalejas this afternoon by a tribe of Aitel Hasen and freed without any ransom being asked. The Colonial Office at Madrid expects Captain Nunez and the mechanic, Ferrer, will be taken aboard any moment.

The gunboat arrived off Bogador on Thursday and sent twenty-six natives ashore to search for the fliers. The search has been difficult, and the action of the friendly tribe was a great relief.

The Commander, who has been well cared for, embraced those aboard the ship after being greeted with shouts of joy. Three airplanes which have also been searching will return to the base at Cape Juby.

Commander Burguete is the son of the president of the War Council and he holds one of the highest Spanish awards for bravery.

GERMAN FASCIST FINED FOR GIBE AT PRESIDENT

Court Refuses to Jail Goebbels for Political Attack Based on Signing of Young Plan.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, May 31.—Dr. Josef Goebbels, a National Socialist member of the Reichstag, got off today with a cash fine of $200 instead of the prison term of nine months which the State's Attorney asked for an insult to President von Hindenburg in an article published in the December National Socialist paper, the Attack.

The article bore the title "Is von Hindenburg Still Alive?" A cartoon captioned "The Saviour Looks On" represented the President seated as a Roman Emperor, half-asleep, on a massive throne. On his shoulders perched a flock of Jewish and Marxist ravens, whispering into his ears, while the German people were shown lock-stepping past under the burdens of the Young plan.

The article and cartoon, which the State's Attorney described as "an extraordinarily perfidious and malicious attack," formed a part of the National Socialist campaign against the Young plan.

Friends of Dr. Goebbels stormed the court room this morning when the case opened and were forcibly ejected. The defendant's Parliamentary immunity from arrest had been lifted by a vote of the Reichstag.

Dr. Goebbels, one of Adolf Hitler's right-hand men, in defending himself, protested the attack was in no wise personal but merely represented an incident in the political battle then under way. He contended the most incriminating sentence in the article was, "Von Hindenburg will do this time, as before, what his Jewish-Marxist advisers urge," and that this was just a fact and hence not libelous.

In letting Dr. Goebbels off with a money fine, the court ruled that the highest official of the Reich always is exposed to political criticism and when this is in the form of a prophecy which constitutes no insult it is wholly permissible. The incriminating editorial, the court ruled, did not unduly attack President von Hindenburg personally.

The fine imposed represents the court's disapproval of the cartoon which accompanied the editorial.

22 ARABS REPRIEVED IN PALESTINE RIOTS

Death Sentences Passed by Courts Are Commuted to Life Imprisonment.

THREE STAND CONDEMNED

Jew Is Carrying His Appeal to London—Einstein Urged Step on Commissioner.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

JERUSALEM, May 31.—Twenty-two of the twenty-five Arabs condemned to be hanged have been saved from death, according to a communiqué issued this afternoon, announcing that the High Commissioner, Sir John Chancellor, has commuted the sentences to life imprisonment. The general expectation that most of the men condemned after last Summer's riots would not suffer the capital penalty is thus confirmed.

Joseph Mizracsi Urphali, the only Jew sentenced to death, "for a murderous offense at Jaffa," has not yet been reprieved, but the government says Urphali is applying for special leave to appeal to the Privy Council.

The death sentences on three Arabs, who were involved in two slayings each, apparently stand.

The communiqué, after giving the names of eleven condemned for Hebron murders, fourteen for Safad murders and one Jew, says the High Commissioner, exercising the powers vested in him by Article 16 of the Palestine order in council of 1922, commutes the death sentences on nine Hebron Arabs and thirteen Safad Arabs to life terms. Those reprieved include Issaelarafi, town councilor and the wealthiest man in Hebron, who was convicted of participation in the murder of his tenant, Cliezer Sionim, manager of the bank of Hebron, and thirty other Jews.

There is a general feeling of relief that the Arabs are not to be hanged, and their reprieve is regarded as a wise political step, which will prevent further disturbances. But many hold the murders were committed purely for criminal motives, and therefore the slayers ought to die.

Brith Shalom, the Jewish peace organization, which is seeking an Arab-Jewish understanding, and which is headed by Dr. K. L. Magnes, president of the Hebrew University, sponsored the collection of 100 signatures, urging the reprieve of all the Arabs sentenced to death. The petition was submitted to the Palestine Government two weeks ago.

JERUSALEM, May 31 (Jewish Telegraphic Agency).—Professor Albert Einstein has cabled Sir John Chancellor, the High Commissioner, urging upon him the commutation of the death sentences passed against a number of Arabs who participated in the riots against Jews last August, it was revealed today by the Felestin, Arab daily in Jaffa.

SAYS ATTACKS ON JEWS HIT RUMANIA'S CREDIT

Envoy to United States Warns That Perpetrators of Abuses Help Hold Nation in Poverty.

BUCHAREST, May 31 (Jewish Telegraphic Agency).—Anti-Semitic excesses harm the credit of Rumania, declared Carol Davila, Rumanian Minister to the United States, now on a visit here, on the eve of his return to America.

"When Rumanian stabilization was launched," Mr. Davila said, "American banks not headed by Jews told our representatives that the issue would not prove successful if the Jewish organizations maintained a hostile attitude. Through great amiability M. Cretziani obtained from the much-lamented Louis Marshall, president of the American Jewish Committee, a favorable statement which determined a change of attitude on the part of Jewish circles.

"In the end an abuse committed against a Jew constitutes a contributory cause to the holding in poverty of the malefactor of his father, who may be a civil service man, badly paid, or a tiller of the soil without implements and paying 30 per cent interest on his loans, or a military man insufficiently trained because of a lack of funds.

"If some citizens or students are convinced that it is well to organize against the Jews there is nothing within the law to stop it. One of the Jewish leaders in America, in a conversation with me, admitted it, although in old Occidental countries such tendencies are anachronisms.

"I therefore make the warmest appeal to our nationalist youth to prevent anti-Semitic outbursts and to give all possible cooperation to the university leaders and college authorities so that these deeds of anarchy, fatal to the country's credit, be ceased.

"In conclusion I must add that American financiers are favorably disposed toward us and toward Rumania's economic and financial status. If we do not bungle the credit we now enjoy I can say we will shortly see an improvement of our markets and credit. But in the name of God, and for the sake of our country, let cruelties, bolshevisms and public discussions about the dynasty stop."

Three Named to Represent Britain at League Inquiry.

GENEVA, May 31 (Jewish Telegraphic Agency).—The Secretariat of the League of Nations issued a communiqué today, according to which Dr. Drummond Shiels, Under-Secretary of the Colonial Office; T. I. K. Lloyd of the Colonial Office, who was secretary of the British Inquiry Commission, and C. Luke, Acting High Commissioner during the Palestine riots, will be the representatives of the British Government in the inquiry on Palestine, which will begin its sessions on June 3.

Dr. Chaim Weizmann, president of the Jewish Agency for Palestine, has arrived here. Informal conferences between Dr. Weizmann and various officials of the League of Nations were held here today.

Fifty Students Attack Them in Streets—Meeting of Protest Today.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BUCHAREST, May 31.—Fifty students attacked Jewish pedestrians in the streets of Bucharest last night and beat them unmercifully. Workmen who tried to intervene in behalf of the Jews also were attacked.

The Jewish community will hold a meeting tomorrow to protest against the decision of the British Government to restrict Jewish immigration in Palestine. A memorandum will be sent to Premier MacDonald.

FRENCH SCORE ENVOY FOR BUYING CARS HERE

Paris Paper Chides Claudel for Adding Praise of Autos in Interview.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, May 31.—Ambassador Claudel, who brought two American automobiles with him on arriving recently for a visit home from the United States, meets crticism in the French press for his failure to support home industry in this instance.

M. Claudel not only brought two American cars home with him but boasted publicly about it, says the newspaper L'Oeuvre, and asked American reporters if they had ever seen such fine cars.

"We would not think of criticizing the Ambassador for all the nice things he said to American news men about the United States," says L'Oeuvre. "It is not the business of an Ambassador to go about saying nasty things about the nation to which he is accredited. But is it entirely necessary for him to bring along American merchandise and, as it were, make himself publicly a salesman for it? And that just at a moment when the Americans are not particularly kind toward us and, in fact, inaugurating a policy which would bar our products, at the same time seek to flood France with their productions and, to cap the climax, instituting within our very borders a system of commercial espionage as revealed in the recent incident of the Poiret dressmaking establishment."

PROMISES FUNDS FOR ITALIAN ARMS

Finance Minister Says Money Will Be Found if Growth Abroad Makes It Necessary.

IS OPTIMISTIC ON FINANCES

But Tells Chamber No Reduction in Taxes Can Be Looked For Soon—Budget Up $38,900,000.

By ARNALDO CORTESI.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ROME, May 31.—Addressing the Chamber of Deputies today, the Finance Minister, Senator Mosconi, while making no effort to hide the difficulties confronting Italian finance at the present moment, especially as a consequence of the world depression, painted on the whole an optimistic picture of Italy's situation.

The Finance Minister indicated clearly that no reduction of taxes could be looked for in the immediate future, as the budget was already cut to the bone and no further reduction of expenditure was possible without obliging the State to give up some of its essential functions. He intimated, however, that Italian public finance was in a period of adjustment in which it was preferable to consolidate past achievements rather than launch into heavy future expenditure. A reduction of some $15,000,000 in the budget of the Ministry of Public Works is an indication of this.

Signor Mosconi gave assurance for which many Italians were eagerly waiting, when he declared that no forced conversion would be resorted to for treasury bonds which fall due in November of next year. They will be paid in full by the government and arrangements are already being made to have on hand the necessary sum, which amounts to about $200,000,000.

The Minister's speech contained reference to recent Italian speeches on disarmament, Signor Mosconi assuring the Chamber that despite the difficulty of making ends meet additional money would be found if growing armaments on the part of foreign nations rendered increased expenditure for Italy's defense necessary.

"If disarmament conferences should fail despite our sincere desire for peace and it should appear at a certain moment which Il Duce alone will be able to indicate to us that our military preparations are so inadequate in the face of growing armaments abroad as to require increased expenditure on our part, then the Italian Finance Minister will answer 'I am ready,'" he declared. "You and the whole Italian people you represent will give the same answer with enthusiasm, because no sacrifice will be too heavy to bear to insure the safety of our country.

"In Europe as in America and in Asia the situation is not rosy. To face it constancy, solidarity and vision are necessary. Premier Mussolini's Government does not minimize the difficulties but feels no doubts because it has unshakable confidence in the profound strength and renewed spirit of the Italian people, which continues with iron will, with fervid energy and with obstinate enthusiasm its march toward its destiny."

ROME, May 31 (AP).—The budget presented to the Chamber of Deputies today totals 19,349,000,000 lire about $967,450,000), which is an increase of 778,000,000 lire (about $38,900,000) over 1929.

Senator Mosconi took pride in the year's gains, saying that the deficit in the commercial balance had been reduced last year from 7,361,000,000 lire (about $368,050,000) to 6,411,000,000 lire (about $320,550,000). He added that the currency circulation had been reduced, while the reserves of the Bank of Italy had increased so that they represent 66 per cent of the currency and 59 per cent of all debts at sight.

THINK WOMAN DIED IN ROTHSTEIN FEUD

Police Identify Body Found in River as Friend of Moran, Once Gambler's Bodyguard.

SIXTH SLAYING IN QUARREL

Anna M. Urbas Was Drowned Because She Was Witness to Killing, Authorities Believe.

The woman whose body was taken from the Harlem River on Thursday was identified yesterday as Anna Margaret Urbas, a friend of Eugene Moran, once a bodyguard of Arnold Rothstein and a racketeer whose career ended nearly a year ago when his bullet-riddled body was found cremated in a burned automobile on a Newark (N. J.) dump.

The woman, murdered, according to police, because she knew too much about the underworld and certain of its characters was the sixth victim in a chain of murders resulting from a feud between followers of Jack (Legs) Diamond and Rothstein, whose death is as much a mystery as it was when he staggered from the Park Central Hotel with a bullet wound in his stomach a year ago last November.

Miss Urbas, or Mrs. Rice, as she was sometimes known, had been sought for several months by police as the key witness against the sole survivor of the trio of thugs who took Moran on the "ride" which ended in Newark in the traditional death of a gangster. This man, trailed for months by detectives, who have never quite caught up with him, is now wanted for questioning about the woman's death as well as that of Moran.

Dentist Makes Identification.

The identification of the dead woman was made by a dentist from New Jersey, where Moran and the woman were living when he was murdered. He was able to make a positive identification by means of a plate in the woman's upper jaw and charts in his office, according to Inspector John J. Stapleton, who refused to reveal the name of the dentist for fear of gang vengeance. The same dentist identified Moran by his teeth.

The dentist's identification was supported by that of Dick Fuqua of 43-22 Fortieth Street, Long Island City, and Andy Gatto of 130 West Forty-seventh Street, friends. Fuqua was said to have told the police he lost track of the woman after Feb. 26, last.

The last that was seen of her, so far as police have been able to learn, was on March 24, when, after leaving a taxicab chauffeur who befriended her, she met a friend named Martha at Madison Avenue and Eighty-sixth Street and said she was going to the Bronx to live. This was three days after Deputy Police Chief Frank E. Brex of Newark made public the identification of Moran and told of the Rothstein link. From the condition of the woman's body when it was taken from the river, tightly bound with wire, police believe she must have been slain about that time.

'Hush' Money Reported Given to Her.

She had been "on the move" ever since Moran was killed, dodging the police as well as the enemies she feared. The police never caught up with her, although apparently her enemies did. Captain Philip Sebold of the Newark police was informed that on the night Moran was murdered one of the thugs who killed him returned to Brielle and gave money to her to "get out and shut up."

Miss Urbas packed up and left "hurriedly," according to statements given the police by Mr. and Mrs. William McKelvey, at whose home in Brielle Moran and the woman lived as "Mr. and Mrs. Rice." Detectives traced her to West Virginia, only to find she had moved on. Later they picked up the trail in Weehawken. She had been living at 36 Sixth Street in that city but had disappeared again.

While living in Weehawken, the woman had taken out a twenty-year endowment policy in the Prudential Life Insurance Company, giving her name as Anna Margaret Urbas. She made her mother, Mary Urbas, of 14,821 Hale Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, the beneficiary.

Miss Urbas left Weehawken on Feb. 21. The police next picked up her trail in Long Island City where, it was learned, she was living with a taxicab driver. The chauffeur said Miss Urbas had disappeared while he was at work. This was three days after the story of Moran's murder was told.

Three men, posing as followers of Moran, but in really members of a rival gang, ordered to "get" him, took the gangster on his death ride on Aug. 9 last year. Miss Urbas saw them start out from Brielle together, Deputy Chief Brex learned in his investigation. In the rear seat sat James Batto, a gambler, and Mortimer (Moe or Monkey) Schubert, a notorious racketeer.

Batto's body, with four shots in the head, was found Sept. 11 in East 107th Street. On Nov. 14 Schubert's body was found in La Salle Street, Manhattan, with six bullet wounds in the head. The driver of the car, whose name is known to the police, is said to have been the man who paid Miss Urbas to get out. He is the only one of the three who has escaped the law or gangster enemies.

DENY SIMONS WAS SUICIDE.

Family of Chicago Man Insists He Was Murdered—$30,000 at Stake.

KENTLAND, Ind., May 31 (AP).—An insurance payment of $30,000 is at stake, authorities learned today, over the question of whether William Simons, former member of the Chicago Board of Trade, killed himself or was murdered. The verdict of a coroner's jury, returned several days after his body was found by a country roadside with bullet wounds in it, was suicide.

A $30,000 life insurance policy on Simons's life, his family revealed, provides for double that amount if the murder theory can be maintained. Investigators for the family pointed out several points which they believe discredits suicide. A post-mortem revealed, they said, that it would have been "next to impossible" for Simons, whose body was found May 20, to have shot himself.

Those upholding the suicide theory said Simons had lost heavily in business, the losses that occurred during his partnership with Warren T. McCray, former Governor, having been estimated at half a million dollars. It was also explained that his health had been declining in recent years.

Preacher Climbs Building And Rescues Swarm of Bees

The Rev. Andrew A. Burkhardt, pastor of the First Reformed Church, College Point, who keeps bees as a hobby, solved a problem at Fifteenth Avenue and 122d Street, College Point, yesterday noon, when he climbed to the coping of the first story of a store in the centre of the business district, shook down a swarm of bees into a cardboard box and took them home.

It was his second swarm for the day. He has seven colonies, and he captured four swarms last year from near-by trees when called on by neighbors who were annoyed and did not know what to do in the circumstances.

It is said that the unwritten law of swarms of bees is that the owner still holds title as long as he can see the swarm. After that a swarm belongs to any one who can take it.

PREDICTS SILES'S RETURN.

La Paz Semi-Official Paper Sees Him in Presidency in August.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LA PAZ, Bolivia, May 31.—Since the resignation of Dr. Hernando from the Presidency and the creation of a government of Cabinet Ministers there has not been any comment on the situation by El Diario, an independent paper with the largest circulation, or by La Razon, a Republican daily.

El Norte, the semi-official paper, reassures its readers in daily editorials that Dr. Viles will return to the Presidency next August after the necessary reforms are made in the Constitution.

The Liberal party and Republican party are already guided by followers of Dr. Siles and he also has the support of the army.

The announcement from Buenos Aires that Abdon Saavedra, banished Vice President, contends he was the legal successor of Dr. Siles was termed a "comical matter" in an El Norte editorial.

MENDEZ WILL FLY TO QUITO.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOGOTA, May 31.—Captain Benjamin Mendez, Colombian aviator, who made a flight from the United States to Colombia last year, will make a good-will flight from Bogota to Quito, Ecuador, on Monday.

He will be on the military mission from Colombia attending the ceremonies at Quito on Wednesday in commemoration of the centenary of the death of Marshal Antonio Jose de Sucre, who won important battles in the war of the liberation of the South American countries from Spain.

Captain Mendez will make the flight in the Ricaurte, which he flew from the United States, and will be accompanied by John Todhunter, his American mechanic.

COLOMBIANS HERE HONOR DR. OLAYA

President-Elect Is Guest of His Countrymen at Dinner and Reception.

PRAISED AS GREAT LEADER

Gets Medal at Roerich Museum as Creator, Builder and Worker for Harmony With Us.

Colombian residents of New York City paid tribute yesterday to the President-elect of their country, Dr. Enrique Olaya Herrera, now Colombian Minister to the United States. He was the guest of honor at a dinner given by the Colombian colony at the Biltmore last night. In the afternoon a reception was held for him at the Roerich Museum, Riverside Drive and 103d Street.

The tribute of the colony was given at the dinner by Dr. Luis Cuervo Marquez, former Minister from Colombia to Great Britain. Dr. Olaya responded with an address in which he thanked the local colony for its honors to him. General Alfredo J. de Leon presided.

Asserting that Colombia faces a difficult situation at the present time, Dr. Olaya urged that Colombians should cease party strife and unite to solve the problems that beset their country. The modern statesman, he said, must not only be a lawyer but an economist, familiar with questions of the production and distribution of wealth.

Dr. Cuervo Marquez expressed confidence that "with the loyal help of all Colombians" the new President would be able to bring the country back to its normal conditions. Liberty, he said, would not suffer under the new administration, for Dr. Olaya was the "expression of the freedom of thought, which is the dearest of all achievements of Colombians."

At the ceremony at the Roerich Museum Dr. Olaya received a medal in recognition of his activity for the promotion of art in his native country and of his work in promoting cordial relations between Colombia and the United States.

Dr Genaro Payan, Colombian Consul General, speaking on behalf of the Colombians present, hailed Dr. Olaya as the "foremost man of the moment." With an honorable, prudent and firm administration, he said, Colombia would take its rightful place among the nations of the world.

Louis L. Horch, president of the museum, in presenting the medal, read a letter of greeting from the institution's honorary head, Nicholas Roerich.

"Dr. Olaya strives not only for all that is best in the past," Mr. Horch said, in the only speech delivered in English, "but represents in himself the forward-looking movement in Colombia."

The words inscribed on the medal, "Honor to the Creator and Builder," Mr. Horch said, expressed the spirit of Dr. Olava's lifework.

In his reply in Spanish, Dr. Olaya expressed his gratitude and that of his country to the United States, and said that Colombia took pride in following the same ideals as the United States. It would be his aim, he declared, to foster a mutual increase in knowledge, good feeling and cultural communion between the two nations.

David E. Grant, president of the Society of Friends of the Roerich Museum, also spoke in praise of the visitor. At the request of General de Leon, who presided, the 250 persons present stood in silence for the recovery of Señora Olaya Herrera, who was prevented by illness from attending. Others on the committee of arrangements were Rafael A. Grau, Maurice M. Lichtman, Carlos Puyo Delgado, S. Roerich, Dr. Guillermo Wills and Luis Zawadsky.

rial progress in the investigation when Dr. Doyle appears before the Federal grand jury tomorrow morning.

Although Dr. Doyle told reporters some time ago that he had never divided a fee with any one, he refused to answer a question to that effect put to him in the grand jury room. His reason for refusing, he said, was that to answer might tend to incriminate or degrade him. The grand jury took the matter up with Federal Judge John M. Woolsey, who ordered that Dr. Doyle must answer, as he did not consider either a "yes" or "no" to the question would be "self-incriminative."

Judge Woolsey upheld Dr. Doyle, however, in his refusal to answer a question as to whether he had ever given any portion of a fee to a public official.

It is understood that Dr. Doyle will be asked what he did with large amounts he received as fees from persons whom he represented before the Board of Standards and Appeals, whether deposited in a bank or not.

Mr. Tuttle and the Federal grand jury have been learning of fees paid to Dr. Doyle through the testimony of numbers of persons he represented. It has also been discovered that in one year alone Dr. Doyle represented eighty-two corporations and individuals before the Board of Standards and Appeals. Cases have been found in which the board acted in favor of the application of Dr. Doyle against considerable opposition from owners of property in the neighborhood affected by the permit sought.

District Attorney Crain and the county grand jury will take up this week the matter of the Lefcourt Colonial Building having been granted a permit in spite of the alleged violation of the zoning laws represented by the plans for that forty-four-story structure. Dr. Doyle appeared before the board on behalf of the Amia Realty Corporation in this case.

Later Mr. Crain will go into the latest development in the inquiry—the report, said to be corroborated by documentary evidence, that Chairman William E. Walsh of the Board of Standards and Appeals occupies a $4,000 apartment at 25 East Eighty-sixth Street for which he pays an annual rental of only $1,500, unsecured by a lease. Mr. Walsh declined to make any comment upon that disclosure, saying he "begged to be excused" as he had "nothing to say."

Both Mr. Crain and Mr. Tuttle are looking forward to the possibility of concrete results in their investigations this week. Both inquiries bear almost directly upon the conduct of the Board of Standards and Appeals, although the Federal investigation directly concerns the bankruptcy of Mrs. Lottie Cutler of Passaic, N. J., who testified she had paid Dr. Doyle and others almost $10,000 to obtain for her a gasoline station permit for property in Jamaica, Queens. She has said she paid Dr. Doyle $5,000 of that amount. He has denied that he ever received from her more than $2,000.

The bankruptcy hearings are still in progress before Referee George W. W. Porter at Paterson, N. J. District Attorney Brower of Kings County had also questioned Dr. Doyle on one occasion and said later that the former veterinarian had expressed a willingness to appear at his office again whenever wanted.

The county grand jury will sit on the Board of Standards and Appeals case on Tuesday.

SENT TO AID 'HUMAN NEEDS'

Common Objective Regardless of Faith Stressed in Donor's Letter —Cardinal Expresses Thanks.

Cardinal Hayes has received a check for $25,000 from John D. Rockefeller Jr. toward the Catholic Charities' annual appeal which closed recently. Mr. Rockefeller contributed the same amount to the fund last year. The gifts were unsolicited. At a meeting last week of the staff at the headquarters of Catholic Charities, 477 Madison Avenue, Cardinal Hayes expressed his appreciation of the gift.

"Our work for the poor and for the needy done on behalf of Christ is one that carries with it many blessings," said Cardinal Hayes. "Mr. Rockefeller, a man of broad vision and generous beyond measure, has given us great encouragement and valuable assistance."

The check was enclosed in a letter from Arthur W. Packard, a private secretary of Mr. Rockefeller, which was in part as follows:

"I am writing in behalf of Mr. Rockefeller Jr., who has observed that the annual campaign of the Catholic Charities of the Archdiocese of New York is now under way.

"To meet human needs, as these charities do, through hospitals, through homes for the aged, through Summer camps for children and through other relief agencies, is to claim the interest and support of New York citizens regardless of religious faith.

"Sympathy which reaches out to relieve suffering and to increase happiness knows no sectarian divisions. To that common objective we are all dedicated—Catholic, Jew and Protestant alike.

"With this thought in mind, although he has not been solicited for a contribution, Mr. Rockefeller would be grateful for the privilege of participating in this campaign. At his request and on his behalf, therefore, I am taking the liberty of enclosing herewith his check."

87 LEADERS HERE BACK JEWISH DRIVE

Sign Public Appeal for Fund of $2,500,000 to Relieve Distress Overseas.

STRESS WORKERS' NEEDS

Campaign Here Is Part of National Effort to Raise $6,000,000 as America's Contribution.

It was announced yesterday that eighty-seven prominent New York Jews have signed a public appeal for support of the Allied Jewish Campaign's drive to raise $2,500,000 toward the $6,000,000 being raised nationally. Among the signers are men with leading places in the city's cultural, political, business and professional life,

"The undersigned join in this statement on behalf of the objectives to which the Allied Jewish Campaign is dedicated and appeal for support of the effort to raise immediately in this city $2,500,000 for the program of reconstructive aid for Jews overseas," the statement read.

"Much of the Jewish population abroad has been restored to self-support and to useful occupations adapted to the special requirements in the lands of their residence. Through the furnishing of small credits, of tools of trade and industry and of machinery, through settlement on the land in agricultural pursuits; through vocational and manual training in the handicrafts, through education for factory and industrial life, through aid to the orphans and aged, through care and prevention of disease and epidemic, through extensive sanitation work in many lands, through the building and reestablishment of hospitals and health centres, through cultural and religious institutions, much has been accomplished.

"While the Jewish population overseas, profoundly grateful for the help of America, is struggling courageously for self-support, it still faces tremendous odds in new States with new boundaries, in the slow spread of new industrial currents and in face of manifold handicaps. In large measure our fellow-Jews overseas now bear the burden of their annual communal needs, but it is impossible for them to carry this heavy task without aid from America."

DISGUISED AS MINERS, FOUR MEN ROB BANK

Customer Beaten and Thousands Taken in Kentucky—Four Others Get $12,000 in Racine.

DAWSON SPRINGS, Ky., May 31 (AP).—Four men dressed as coal miners, with coal dust on their faces, held up the First National Bank here today and escaped with several thousand dollars.

Two men entered the bank and forced the assistant cashier, W. A. Morris, to lie down. Clay Brennan, a customer, was struck on the head with the butt of a pistol and two other customers were forced into a rear room.

The robbers then gathered up the money from the vault and from the cash drawers. One bandit sat in an automobile at the curb and another stood at the front door.

The men escaped in an automobile bearing an Indiana license number, and were out of sight before a posse could be organized.

The hold-up occurred fifteen minutes after the bank opened for business. The exact amount stolen was not determined.

RACINE, Wis., May 31 (AP).—Four unmasked men held up the West Racine Bank today, herded five persons into the vault and escaped with $12,000 in cash. The men jumped into a car manned by a fifth member of the band.

P. Walter Peterson, the president, was in the vault when the robbery occurred. Four employes were ordered inside, and one of the robbers asked him:

"Where's your big dough?"

"There's nothing but a little chicken feed in here," Peterson answered. Three of the men rifled the cages of loose money, while the fourth, armed with a sawed-off shotgun, guarded the persons in the vault.

TOUR PROSPECTS BETTER.

Steamship Agents Say Teachers and Students Plan Trips.

Although the first cabin transatlantic traffic is at a lower ebb now than it ever has been at this season of the year, there is a big demand for cabin accommodation and still more for the popular tourist third cabin.

Steamship agents said yesterday that 80 per cent of the teachers and students who travel use that class. Most of the European nations have a special low visa fee for these tourists, the agents said.

Dr. Ernest Gray Keller, general manager of the Student Travel Club, 511 Fifth Avenue, said that 4,000 members of the club will go to Europe before the end of July. He said that he is starting the pilgrimage to the Passion Play at Oberammergau with 200 on the Cunarder Berengaria on June 3.

TIMES SQ. ADVANCES AS CITY TRANSIT HUB

Board Estimates 187,587,120 Passed Through Turnstiles There in 1929.

3,356,000,000 ON ALL LINES

Rapid Transit, Trolleys and Buses Showed an Increase of 91,000,000 Passengers in Year.

The rapid transit, surface car and bus lines of the city carried 3,356,000,000 passengers in the year ended Dec. 31, 1929, according to a quarterly report made public yesterday by the Transit Commission. The commission's statistics showed a gain of 91,000,000 passengers over the calendar year of 1928.

The 1929 record showed that 93,793,560 fares were collected at Interborough and B. M. T. booths at Times Square, as compared with 91,020,076 in 1928. Times Square, the report showed, is still the busiest point in the city's rapid transit system, it being estimated that 187,587,120 persons passed through the turnstiles, assuming that at least as many persons leaving trains used its facilities as those who started their journeys there.

For the first time in the city's history the rapid transit and surface car lines combined accounted for more than 3,000,000,000 passengers, the official figures being 3,007,000,000, an increase of $53,500,000 over the previous calendar year. In addition the Hudson & Manhattan tube line carried 112,300,000 passengers, and bus companies, exclusive of the Tompkins Bus Corporation in Staten Island and the municipal lines, accounted for 111,200,000 more, bringing the total of rapid transit, surface car and bus traffic to 3,230,500,000, an increase of 63,200,000, or 2 per cent, over the same group's total for 1928.

In 1929 the Tompkins lines carried 18,000,000 passengers, and municipal bus traffic, which makes no report to the Transit Commission, was estimated at 107,500,000, making a grand total of 3,356,000,000 for the entire city transportation system.

I. R. T.'s Quota 39.12 Per Cent.

The report indicated that the Interborough system carried 39.12 per cent of the total, its subway division accounting for 28.76 per cent and its elevated lines for 10.36. Street car lines carried 29.46 per cent, the B. M. T. system 21.02, buses (exclusive of municipal lines) 3.85; Hudson Tube lines, 3.35; municipal buses, 3.20. The combined rapid transit lines carried 60.14 per cent of the total traffic.

According to the commission's report the comparative fare collections at Times Square for the calendar years 1928 and 1929 were as follows:

	1929.	1928.	Increase.
Interbor'gh	57,165,001	55,671,977	1,493,024
B. M. T.	36,628,559	35,348,099	1,280,460
Total	93,793,560	91,020,076	2,773,484

Rapid transit traffic alone exceeded the 2,000,000,000 mark, with 2,018,300,000 passengers, a gain of 75,800,000 or 3.9 per cent over the 1928 figures. The greatest gain in this classification was made by the Interborough's subway division with 365,100,000 pasengers, or 51,000,000 more than 1928. The elevated division, however, showed a loss, carrying 347,800,000 passengers or 1,300,000 fewer than last year. The B. M. T. lines carried 705,400,000, a gain of 26,100,000 or 3.9 per cent over the 1928 figures.

According to the report the Interborough subway lines reached a traffic peak of 3,489,790 passengers on Dec. 23, 1929, while its maximum elevated traffic of 1,093,669 was attained on Oct. 7. The B. M. T. peak of 2,336,108 was reached on Dec. 9.

Drop on Surface Lines.

Street railways, including the Williamsburg Bridge local line, carried 988,700,000 passengers, a drop of 22,300,000 from the 1928 figures. The greatest decrease, a 5.9 per cent drop, was in Manhattan, where they carried 17,800,000 fewer passengers than in 1928. Brooklyn traffic fell off by 7,700,000, and in Richmond 300,000 fewer persons were carried. The Bronx surface lines, however, gained 4,300,000, and in Queens there was an increase of 1,700,000.

The Fifth Avenue Coach Company reported to the commission a total of 60,200,000 passengers, or a drop of 4,100,000. This 6.3 per cent decrease was partly due to discontinuance of operation in May, 1928, of its two Bronx lines, which carried 2,900,000 passengers from Jan. 1 to the date of discontinuance.

Bus transportation in the Bronx, operated by the Surface Transportation Corporation, a Third Avenue Railway subsidiary, handled 38,200,000 passengers in 1929, as compared with 25,700,000 in 1928. For the first five months of 1928, however, the company's route mileage varied from 6.3 to 41.4, as compared with 58.18 miles operated since June 1, 1928.

Operating revenues of combined rapid transit and street surface railways, the commission reported, were $161,340,000 in 1929, an increase of $3,406,000 over the previous year. The rapid transit lines alone brought in $107,844,000, a gain of $4,576,000 over their 1928 record. Of this gain the Interborough's subway division accounted for $3,007,000, its revenue being $52,075,000. The Interborough's elevated division reported operating revenue of $19,112,000, an increase of $179,000 over 1928. The gain was due, however, to a $258,000 increase in advertising revenue, the passenger revenue declining $53,000.

The B. M. T.'s operating revenues of $36,657,000 topped by $1,390,000 the figures for 1928.

Total operating revenues of surface lines reached $53,496,000 for the year, or $1,170,000 less than in 1928. Manhattan companies accounted for most of the decrease with a drop of $890,000, while Brooklyn lines took in $496,000 less than in 1928. There was a drop of $28,000 in Richmond. Gains were made in the Bronx, where surface lines reported an increase of $193,000, and in Queens, where the gain was $50,000.

KING STARTS CANAL DIGGING

Belgian Monarch Makes First Cut for Liege-Antwerp Waterway.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BRUSSELS, May 31.—Albert, King of the Belgians, cut the first sod for the Liege-Antwerp canal today by setting in motion a steam shovel which began the work of digging. Cardinal Van Roey, the Belgian Primate, blessed the work.

Several Cabinet Ministers, in official addresses, described the advantages of the new Albert Canal to 10,000 boatmen who navigate Belgium's interior waterways. Its opening, it was stated, will enable boats to cover the distance between Liege and Antwerp in thirty hours, instead of in eight days, as at present.

services in rescuing wounded under fire in Nicaragua three years ago, led a squadron of nine planes aloft to open the program with a series of close formation manoeuvres. The marines put their Hawks through a precision drill in the air that included loops, tight banks and the closest of V's, ending with a realistic "ground-strafing" attack.

Then, with two of his comrades from Quantico, Lieutenants W. P. Youngs and G. D. Chappell, Lieutenant Schilt went up again. This time the program was reminiscent of the work of Colonel Lindbergh and the navy "high hats" at Cleveland. The three planes might easily have been tied together with twenty-foot cords throughout the flight save for the final manoeuvre, in which the three machines from a V formation rolled at the same moment, Schilt continuing on the same course head downward, Youngs careening to the left and Chappell to the right.

Main Event Five Races in One.

The Curtiss Marine Trophy race was next on the program. This event is really five races flown at the same time over the same course with five types of seaplanes. The winner is always a pilot in one of the fleet fighting craft, but this feat, repeated again today, does not prevent the other pilot flying heavy bombers, amphibians or the low-powered trainers from giving a good account of themselves.

To stimulate interest in the race Assistant Secretary of the Navy Ingalls put up a trophy for the highest figure of merit attained in the event and today it was won by D. W. Harrigan of Hampton Roads in a consolidated Whirlwind-powered training plane with a speed of 102.02 miles an hour for the hundred miles. Harrigan's plane is rated at 92 miles an hour.

Two Rivals Close Behind Page.

Interest, however, centred in the contest between the pilots of the fighters. Captain Page, picked as the winner before the race, justified all expectations. He was the last to take off and at once began to pick up the others, passing plane after plane.

Close behind was Lieutenant A. P. Storrs of Anacostia. Storrs's Wasp-powered Hawk was not quite fast enough, but he made the best of it and his vertical banks around the home pylon, just over the naval air station, saved him many a precious second during the race. He averaged 152.96 miles an hour.

Third place went to Lieutenant J. E. Dyer of the battle fleet, who pushed his Wasp-powered Vought past three of the fighters with an average for the hundred miles of 145.81 miles an hour. His speed gave him first place in the observation class.

Lieutenant P. D. Stroop of the scouting fleet won in the bombing and torpedo plane division, making the hundred miles in his Hornet-powered Martin at 118.72 miles an hour.

Lieutenant T. D. Guinn of Hampton Roads took first place in the amphibians, pushing his Wasp-Loening over the course at the rate of 117.84 miles an hour.

Smoking Plane Causes Fire Fear.

Five of the twenty-four starters were forced to land because of mechanical or motor trouble. Lieutenant E. R. De Long of the Battle Fleet, at the start of his last lap flew by the stands with his motor smoking so heavily that a cry of fire went up from the crowd.

De Long made his turn and started down the river, but the smoke increased and he banked down to alight on the water. He taxied past the stands, still smoking, but when a rescue squad rushed out with a fire extinguished he waved them off. He diagnosed his engine failure as "oil trouble" instead of fire.

To top off the day, Lieutenant M. B. Gardner, using the Seahawk that was formerly Lieutenant Alford J. Williams's plane, gave an exhibition of inverted flight. He flew around the pylons head down in an outside bank, climbed on his back and ended his display of air mastery with an outside loop and the falling leaf.

Among those who watched the race with Rear Admiral W. A. Moffett, Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, and Assistant Secretary Ingalls, was the donor of the trophy, Glenn H. Curtiss, the first seaplane pilot in the history of heavier than air flying.

Miss Elinor Smith, holder of the woman's solo duration record, broadcast a description of the day's events over a nation-wide radio chain.

ing aloft a number of passengers on short flights. He also had thrilled spectators by flying at low altitudes.

Planned to Take Passenger.

At 6 o'clock tonight he was scheduled to take off for New York with Major Tilt. Tilt was about to board the seaplane when he remembered that he had left his hat behind. While he returned to the club for his hat Stollwerck went aloft for another short spin.

A moment later, spectators saw the plane writhe in mid-air and shoot downward, landing on the water upside down. Major Tilt came out to the beeach just as the accident occurred.

While calls were sent in to the police and to the Coast Guard at Point Lookout, James Finan, a life guard at the beach, and Raymond Keenan, a member of the Lido Club, commandeered a canoe and started to paddle out to the wrecked plane, heedless of the choppy water that threatened momentarily to upset their frail craft.

They reached the wreck and after a few minutes' search for the body were forced by rough water to put back to shore. Finan obtained a catamaran and again ventured out to the plane.

Meanwhile, a New York Police Department airplane had reached the scene and circled overhead. The crew of htis ship signalled to shore that it could not find Stollwerck's body.

A Coast Guard cutter arrived at the scene within an hour of the accident and its crew also was unsuccessful in finding the body. A hasty examination revealed that the motor was missing. It had been torn from the nose of the plane by the impact and had sunk.

It was believed that the chances for recovering the body immediately were slight, owing to the strong tide that was running. Coast Guards and civilians, however, continued the search for some time after the mishap. As darkness fell, the work of towing the wreckage to the New York Air Terminal, at the foot of Eighty-eighth Street and Riker Avenue, North Beach, Queens, was begun. Stollwerck had kept his plane berthed in a hangar there.

Mr. Frambach, who is a member of the New York Curb Exchange, said he did not know what relation the missing flier was to Heinrich Stollwerck, the German chocolate manufacturer. He said, however, that the pilot had been flying since he was 14 years old and that he was a German World War ace and the holder of an Iron Cross. Stollwerck's home was in Berlin, and he was married only eight months ago, according to Mr. Frambach.

The plane was known as a high wing, monoplane flying boat, of a type introduced only recently into this country by the French concern. It was owned by the C. T. Stork Corporation of Broadway and Fifty-seventh Street, New York, agents for the French company.

Mr. Stollwerck had been staying at the Hotel Shelton, Lexington Avenue and Forty-ninth Street, since April 4.

STUNT FLIER KILLED IN AIRPLANE RACE

Wind Overturns Capt. McKinney's Craft as He Makes Vertical Bank at Teterboro.

Special to The New York Times.

TETERBORO, N. J., May 31.—When his plane sideslipped on a turn in an airplane race here today, Captain Ive McKinney, former army flier and widely known stunt pilot, crashed on the edge of the Teterboro Airport and received injuries of which he died in the Hackensack Hospital.

The race, one of the closing events of a two-day air carnival, was held for the benefit of the Passaic Chapter of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. McKinney, who had thrilled thousands with hair-raising stunts over airports near New York for several years, was flying low, barely skimming the treetops and cutting corners sharply. On the second lap he pulled the New Standard plane into a vertical bank to round the south pylon and a sudden gust of wind flipped the plane upside down.

The pilot struggled to right the ship by a manoeuvre known as a half roll, but the loss of altitude which always accompanies the roll carried him so low that his wing tip caught in the rough ground. The plane cartwheeled over and came to rest near the airport boundary, a complete wreck. Spectators and airport attendants rushed to the scene as the other contestants in the race quickly landed.

The unconscious pilot was dragged from the wreckage. Despite the speed at which the accident occurred McKinney's long experience enabled him to take the precaution of cutting his ignition switches off and that probably prevented the plane from taking fire. His legs and jaw were broken and he was injured internally. He died in the hospital at 8:30 P. M.

McKinney had lived in Hackensack since his employment here as a pilot and instructor in the New Standard Flying Service. He had been connected with many aviation enterprises and had had several bad accidents within the last two years. Since last August he had crashed three times on this airport, but his injuries were relatively slight and a few weeks found him again in the air, stunting. Before he came here he was the leader of the Gates Air Circus, which toured the country on stunting exhibitions and finally installed itself at the Holmes Airport in Queens. He also had a severe accident at that airport. A week or so later he hobbled to the field on crutches, gave them to a mechanic and took off on a series of combat manoeuvres in his crippled conditions.

He was considered one of the leading circus fliers of America.

McKinney was born in Medford, Ore. He was 35 years old and was engaged to be married to Miss Grace Ayres of Ridgefield Park, N. J. She was on the field at the time of the accident.

LOOTED ST. LOUIS BANK WEATHERS ALL-DAY RUN

Trucks Haul Cash to Meet Withdrawals as Depositors Learn It Lost $400,000 in Robbery.

ST. LOUIS, May 31 (AP).—The Grand National Bank, looted of more than $1,000,000 in cash, securties and other valuables taken from safe deposit boxes a week ago, weathered a run today.

A long line of customers, fearing the institution would fail after disclosure yesterday that its part of the loss would approximate $400,000, filed through the bank all day wthdrawing deposits. At times the line extended for more than a block down the street.

Twice money trucks arrived with additional cash from the Federal Reserve Bank. One delivery, the bank announced, consisted of $450,000 lent for the emergency by the Chase National Bank of New York.

Late today President Ed Mays declared that the crisis had passed and that demands had been met and would continue to be met. He said the bank was solvent.

Continuing their investigation, police officials reiterated their opinion, the robbery was an "inside job." They were convinced that some one in the bank's employ was familiar with the robbers' plans before the looting, which took place last Sunday morning while the safe deposit vault, being dismantled for moving, was unguarded. Gifford J. Herbert, cashier, who has resigned, and William A. Brittin, custodian of the vault, who was discharged yesterday, are under $50,000 bonds pending investigation.

SAYS PLUTO'S SIZE IS THAT OF MARS

Dr. Slipher, Flagstaff Director, Declares Observations Show No Cometary Features.

HUE OF PLANET IS YELLOW

Dr. Shapley at Harvard Says Tests Indicate That It May Be Going Toward the Sun.

FLAGSTAFF, Ariz., May 31 (AP).—Dr. V. M. Slipher, director of Lowell Observatory, said today that the new planet, Pluto, discovered by the observatory last January is about the size of Mars and that further study had revealed no cometary features.

"The preliminary orbit of Planet X," Dr. Slipher reported, "has been computed by the Lowell Observatory staff, with the collaboration of Dr. John A. Miller, director of Sproul Observatory, using positions of Jan. 23, Feb. 23 and March 23, determined from the Lowell plates of Dr. C. O. Lampland, and yielded the following elements referred to mean equinox 1930.0:

"Node, 109 degrees 21 minutes; inclination, 17 degrees 21 minutes; log. semi-major axis, 2.3359; eccentricity, 0.090; longitude perihelion, 12 degrees, 52 minutes; mean daily motion, 1.112; mean anomaly, 1930.0, 3 degrees 20 minutes 47 seconds. Distance from sun, 41.3 astronomical units.

"Our knowledge of the orbit's shape and size, its eccentricity and semi-major axis, must be regarded as probably subject to considerable modification when more extended positions are available, but the plane of the orbit—its inclination and the line of nodes—and the present distance of the object are fairly reliably known in the present orbital data.

Planet Has Yellowish Hue.

"Color tests of Planet X indicated this body is yellowish and very different from the blue planets Uranus and Neptune. This suggests an albedo and density more like those of the inner planets.

"If Mars were removed to the distance of 41.3 astronomical units, his stellar magniture would not be greater than Planet X. That is, this new body may be comparable with Mars in size and mass.

"If the albedo were lower, like Mercury or the moon, the size of the planet would be greater, and if the albedo were higher the body would be smaller. But in the case of Mars or either of the others, the planetary disc would still be too small to be seen.

"Careful visual observations have not recognized the disk of Planet X, although on a few favorable occasions it has appeared to show not quite the same type of image as the equally faint stars. Some experiments are planned to throw light on this question.

"Concerning the nature of this object, the longest exposures with the reflector by Lampland and the repeated visual observations with the refractor by E. C. Slipher have revealed no cometary features. Besides, comets have been observed at nothing like this distance from the sun. As for asteroids, Planet X would outshine one hundredfold the largest of the asteroids, Ceres, if removed to the same distance."

Traveling Toward the Sun.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., May 31.—Dr. Harlow Shapley, director of the Harvard Observatory, in commenting on Dr. Slipher's observations, said tonight that recent information from the Royal Observatory of Belgium permits a reconsideration of the orbital elements of the planet.

Dr. Shapley said:

"At the Royal Observatory of Belgium at Brussels an object has been detected on a photographic plate of Jan. 27, 1927, which appears to be Planet X (Pluto). This earlier position permits a reconsideration of the orbital elements.

"As expected, some of the properties of the planet's orbit were well determined by the Lowell Observatory computations, and others have been greatly changed.

Dr. Commelin of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, England, using the new Brussels position, has computed a new orbit which indicates that the period of Planet X is approximately 265 years, and that the planet is approaching the sun at the present time, rather than receding. For the next fifty years it will get gradually brighter, though it will always be difficult to work on, since it never will get much nearer the sun than the planet Neptune.

"The eccentricity of the orbit, as computed by Dr. Crommelin, is about three-tenths, instead of nine-tenths as indicated by the Lowell Observatory orbit. This revision means that the orbit is much more nearly circular, like that of a planet, rather than like that of a comet.

"Deductions by the Flagstaff observers concerning the size, color and present distance from the earth, are not affected by these new European results."

GEM LOOT SOUGHT IN CANADA BY POLICE

Mulrooney Sends Detectives to Other Cities Here Also for Light on Jewelry Ring.

BUFFALO INQUIRY STARTS

Police Envoy Opens O'Connor Strong Box There, but Finds Woman Got to It First.

New York City police have gone to Canada with the hope of making further arrests and additional seizures of stolen jewelry. Searches are being made also in several cities of the United States. These flying trips are a direct result of the capture last week of five men and a woman as receivers of stolen goods and the seizure of more than $1,000,000 in jewelry, now held at headquarters. Police Commissioner Mulrooney announced these facts yesterday. He declined to name the cities, but it is known that men have gone to Chicago, Buffalo and Cincinnati.

One of the detectives, George Whalen, arrived in Buffalo yesterday, according to The Associated Press, and within a short time he and a Buffalo detective went to the Liberty Bank with a court order to open a safe deposit box of William J. O'Connor, a Buffalo man, who is held in this city as ringleader of the group seized in the Hotel Commodore last Monday.

It was disclosed last night that the safe deposit box had been examined by Mrs. O'Connor a few minutes before it was searched by the detectives, The Associated Press dispatch said. Whalen arrived at the bank after it had closed for the day and delay was occasioned until the time clocks on the vault could be adjusted.

While waiting the policeman was informed by a bank attaché that Mrs. O'Connor had visited the vault only a few minutes before it had been closed. She was unaccompanied and remained only a few minutes. When the box finally was turned over to the police it contained only insurance policies and other personal papers. Whalen studied these papers and announced they were of no value in the investigation.

O'Connor, a minor politician and boxing referee, had a record of nine previous arrests in Buffalo, the dispatch revealed, but before getting his license from the boxing board induced the police chief to remove the record from the file.

O'Connor and his companion, Jacob Rosen, made another futile effort to gain freedom on bail yesterday. They, as well as James W. Watson of Chicago and George Cole, who are being held also on a murder charge from Hot Springs, Ark., and Hilda Carter were held without bail until Monday by Magistrate Adolph Stern in Yorkville Court.

James D. C. Murray, O'Connor's attorney, seeking his release in $25,000 bail, pictured his client as "an innocent victim of circumstances," without a police record. Magistrate Stern settled the question by ruling that bail in a felony case is a matter of discretion with the Magistrate.

Commissioner Mulrooney would not say what clues he had that sent men flying to Canada and other cities in the United States. It may be that the two code books found in the Commodore room have been deciphered and furnished information.

The commissioner, for the first time yesterday, took official cognizance of the package of money tossed out of the window of the Commodore when the five were arrested. He announced that there was $17,500 in cash awaiting a claimant and added that he did not know who is the rightful owner of the money.

In view of the report that the money was sent there to buy back stolen jewelry there is every indication that the money finally will find its way into the police pension fund. No insurance company cares to admit that it was dickering for the return of stolen jewels after what happened to Noel C. Scaffa, an investigator who bought back a valuable pearl necklace. He was indicted for compounding a felony, although found not guilty when tried.

THEATRE MEN WAIT ON TICKET PROJECT

League Expected to Appoint H. D. Savage as Executive at Wednesday's Meeting.

DELAYS DISTRIBUTION PLAN

Machinery Probably Will Be Set Up by Middle of Next Month—$150,000 Budget for Policing.

While the plan formulated by the New York Theatre League, Inc., for eliminating ticket speculation will not go into effect today as originally planned, discussion looking to the adoption of a definite date for its application will take place at a meeting of the league on Wednesday at the Empire Theatre.

It is expected the appointment of H. D. Savage as executive secretary will be announced after this meeting. Mr. Savage, with many years of experience in the banking and industrial fields, now is studying the theatrical industry and planning an organization for his work. Upon the completion of this organization will depend the action of the league in setting a date on which the new plan of ticket distribution will go into effect, it was said. However, it is considered probable that the league will have its machinery ready by the middle of next month.

About $150,000 will be used as an annual budget for policing ticket agencies to make certain that premiums above 75 cents are not charged and that no "buys" are made between producer and ticket broker.

It was reported yesterday that employes of one of the large producers who had agreed to abide by the plan of the league attempted to dispose of blocks of seats to ticket agents contrary to the rules of the organization. When the producer's attention was called to the situation he said that it was "a mistake" and the attempt to force a "buy" was dropped.

At present George White, Jed Harris and Herman Shumlin are the only producers who have not joined the league.

LABOR TO DEFEND 6 REDS.

Communists Face Death Sentence in Atlanta for Insurrection.

Plans for the defense of six Communist organizers, facing possible death sentences for "inciting to insurrection" in Atlanta, Ga., were outlined yesterday by Oliver C. Hancock, Georgia attorney, who has been retained by the International Labor Defense.

The arrests were made at labor organization meetings held in Atlanta, the attorney said. The defense will centre on the constitutionality of the "insurrection" statute passed during the Civil War and never tested. The challenge of the law will be made on the ground that it inflicts a disproportionate penalty, a prison sentence being possible only if the jury, upon convicting, makes a plea for mercy.

Two of the Communists, M. H. Powers and Joseph Carr, were arrested on March 9 while holding a meeting, but were freed for lack of evidence. Subsequently they were indicted on the "insurrectionary charge." The other four were arrested ten days ago. They are Mary Dalton and Anna Burlak and two Negroes, Henry Storey and Gilmer Brady.

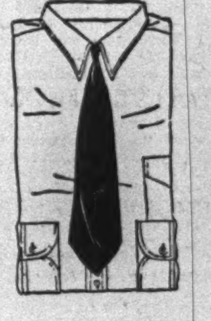
FOR SPORTSMEN AND SPECTATORS

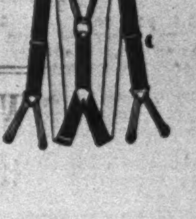
Stylists report that sports coats and flannel trousers are much in evidence these days at all out-door sports events. A particularly interesting fashion note is the favor shown gabardine jackets in a new shade of green with a grayish cast. This pleases me because several weeks ago I was very much taken with a sports coat in this unusual shade, which I saw on a tour of the John David Shop at Fifth Avenue.

THIS SPORTS JACKET HAD a smartly belted back and outside patch pockets ($45). I saw other jackets of blue flannel in single and double breasted style ($20). Trousers of fine white doeskin flannel ($20) are very smart with these jackets. Blue or tan striped flannel trousers ($15) are equally good.



IMPORTED WHITE BROADCLOTH SHIRTS ($5) are smart and practical for both spectator and sportsman. Made in collar attached style of English broadcloth of fine quality and high lustre. Plain color ties of wide wale super quality twill ($2) are ideally suited to summer sports and business wear.

THURSTON'S ENGLISH SUSPENDERS ($5), imported by John David, are the best looking things in the way of braces that I've seen in a dog's age. They may be had in plain pastel shades of blue and yellow or in regimental stripes. All hand-sewn. Doeskin or leather ends.



Attire for the spectator as well as the active sportsman may be purchased at all John David Stores. Feminine shoppers and advisers seem to prefer the Fifth Avenue Shop at 43rd Street or the Broadway establishment at 32nd Street.

MRS. COUGHLIN GETS A MEXICAN DIVORCE

Former Deputy Probation Chief Here Charged Philadelphia Man With Desertion.

SUSPENDED WITH COOLEY

Under Fire in Investigation of Salary Payments to Former Official's Sister.

Mrs. Eileen S. Coughlin, who was suspended recently as deputy chief of the Probation Bureau of the Court of General Sessions when the New York County grand jury began an investigation of that bureau, has obtained a divorce in Cuernavaca, Mexico, from her husband, a Philadelphia salesman, it was learned yesterday. The decree, granted on a charge of desertion, was dated May 9, and was made final May 14.

Mrs. Coughlin and Edwin J. Cooley, former chief of the Probation Bureau, were suspended from office April 24 at their own request when it was discovered that Mrs. Marguerite F. Lawler, Cooley's sister, had been retained on the payroll of the Probation Bureau as provisional chief clerk while she was a public school teacher in Buffalo.

Harold G. Hastings, Assistant District Attorney, began an investigation of alleged fraud and conspiracy, announcing that he would seek indictments against Cooley and the two women. After questioning Mrs. Coughlin, he announced that she had admitted to him that Mrs. Lawler had received pay from the bureau totaling $1,077 from April to October of last year, though she had seldom appeared at work because of ill health.

Cooley resigned from the bureau on May 5 while the investigation was still in progress, but Mrs. Coughlin denied through her attorney that she had any intention of quitting the job definitely. Mrs. Coughlin, who has two sons, declined to comment last night at her home, 317 East Eighteenth Street.

SEEK PAGE & SHAW FUNDS.

Stockholders Sue for $1,060,000 and Ask for Receiver.

BOSTON, May 31 (AP).—Action was begun in Superior Court today by stockholders of Page & Shaw, Inc., candy manufacturers, for the recovery of $1,060,000 and the appointment of a receiver for the concern. The corporation was the subject of a recent investigation by a grand jury which returned indictments against twenty-three persons alleged to be involved in the sale of its stock.

James R. Murdock and Charles H. Johnson, both of Raynham, filed bills in equity with the court.

Murdock seeks to recover for the company $75,000 said to have been paid to Raymond D. Holland, a director, as a bonus for the sale of the Class A stock, as well as $975,000, alleged to have been received from the company by two stock brokers as gratuities and bonuses.

Johnson's action was to secure a claim of $10,000 which he said he invested in the Class A stock. His bill named Holland and Otis E. Dunham, president of the corporation.

The formation of a committee of stockholders to handle claims against the company was revealed in the bills.

Judge Cox acted on Johnson's bill by issuing a special precept for the attachment of $12,000 in the property of Dunham, Holland and the corporation. The Johnson bill is returnable Monday and the Murdock bill Thursday.

CONTESTS PENSION VETO.

Veterans Body Urges Pressure on Congress to Override It.

KANSAS CITY, May 31 (AP).—Seeking to have Congress override President Hoover's recent veto of the Spanish-American War veterans' pension increase bill, national headquarters of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States here today telegraphed all State commanders of the organization to urge their Congressional representatives to vote for passage of the measure over the President's veto.

"If Mr. Hoover's veto is permitted to defeat this proposed pension increase the tributes that were uttered over every soldier's grave in the nation on Memorial Day can only be interpreted as meaningless phrases," said R. B. Handy Jr., Adjutant General of the V. F. W.

"The 100,000 veterans of the days of '98 will be benefited by this legislation, and its passage, too long delayed already, is extremely important to their welfare."

DR. J. W. FEWKES, ETHNOLOGIST, DEAD

Became Famous Through His Study of Ancient Civilization of Hopi Indians.

MADE MESA VERDE A PARK

Chief of Smithsonian Institution's American Ethnology Bureau for 23 Years.

FOREST GLEN, Md., May 31 (AP).—Dr. Jesse Walter Fewkes, who delved deep into the folklore and life of the Indians of the Southwest, died today at his home here after a short illness. He was in his seventy-ninth year.

Burial will take place in Abbey Mausoleum, Arlington County, Va., tomorrow.

Prominent in two fields of science, biology and ethnology, Dr. Fewkes gave descriptions of snake dances, customs and religions among the Hopi Indians and other tribes that did much to arouse public interest in their ancient civilizations.

He was the first man to make use of the phonograph in recording Indian music. He was initiated into the secret rites of the Hopi Indians, who called him Medicine Bowl, because they said he was always pouring information into them . His work made the Mesa Verde National Park a pilgrimage centre. He was field director of the Hemenway Southwestern Archaeological Expeditions in Arizona in 1891 and 1894 and was said to have the most extensive collection of Indian pottery ever brought from the Southwest.

Dr. Fewkes was chief of the Bureau of American Ethnology of the Smithsonian Institution from 1895 to 1918 and was a member of numerous scientific societies.

A Pupil of the Great Agassiz.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 31.—Dr. Fewkes was born in Newton, Mass., on Nov. 14, 1850. As a student at Harvard University in the '70s he was a pupil of the great naturalist, Louis Agassiz. He worked and studied also at Leipzig and Naples and in France. During most of this time he was connected with the Museum of Comparative Zoology at Harvard.

He married Florence G. Eastman, who died in 1888. In 1893 he married Harriet Olivia Cutler of Cambridge, Mass., whose death preceded his own by but a few weeks.

In a statement issued today, the Smithsonian Institution said:

"The publication of Dr. Fewkes's first work under the Smithsonian marked the beginning of intensive archaeological work on Southwestern cliff houses and pueblos. His outstanding archaeological achievement among many is the excavation and repair, begun in 1908, of many of the cliff-dwellings and temples situated in Mesa Verde National Park, Col. His work on Spruce Tree House and Cliff Palace, two of the largest cliff dwellings in the Southwest, was one of the pioneer projects for the thorough excavation and repair of ruins in the prehistoric pueblo area. Aside from their value in connection with the pre-history of the American Indians, the restorations have made of the park a life-size museum from which thousands take away annually a more just conception of the culture of the people the white men displaced.

His Work in West Indies.

"The number and extent of the researches and excavations which Dr. Fewkes initiated as a pioneer give him perhaps a unique place in American archaeology. They include work among the native peoples of the West Indies, an archaeological survey of the Gulf Coast of Mexico, excavations in Trinidad and the Lesser Antilles, and, more recently, investigations of Florida and South Carolina mounds."

Among the many honors, American and foreign, received by Dr. Fewkes in the course of his scientific career of more than half a century, was membership in the National Academy of Science and the presidency of the American Anthropological Association.

E. A. KELLY DEAD; SHIPPING AUTHORITY

Former Vice President of Emergency Fleet's Board Is Stricken in Kingston.

BEGAN CAREER AS CLERK

Had Charge of Operations for Clyde-Mallory Lines Before Entering Federal Service.

KINGSTON, N. Y., May 31 (AP).—Edward A. Kelly, former vice president of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, died at his home here today at the age of 55.

The funeral will be held on Tuesday.

Mr. Kelly had been suffering from heart disease. He was born in Kingston, the son of Edward and Elizabeth Murray Kelly, attended St. Joseph's Parochial School there and came to New York at the age of 22, immediately entering the employ of the Clyde-Mallory Lines.

Starting as a clerk, Mr. Kelly was rapidly promoted, becoming general agent fifteen years ago. He became assistant general manager three years later and vice president in charge of operations in 1925. In that year he also was appointed a member of the committee on seagoing personnel of the American Steamship Owners' Association.

In April, 1927, when General A. C. Dalton, president of the Emergency Fleet Corporation of the United States Shipping Board, reorganized the corporation, Mr. Kelly resigned from the Clyde-Mallory Lines to become a vice president of the former. He was at once made a trustee and placed in charge of operations, going to Washington to reside.

He resigned last December because of ill health and returned to the family residence at 127 Greenkill Avenue, Kingston.

He was a member of the Ulster County Association of this city and the New York Athletic Club and an ex-governor of the Catholic Club of New York.

Mr. Kelly never married. He is survived by a brother and three sisters, Walter J. and Katherine H. Kelly of New York and Mary E. and Anna M. Kelly of Kingston.

A requiem mass will be celebrated on Tuesday at 10 A. M. in St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Church, Kingston. Burial will be in St. Mary's Cemetery.

SHIP RAMS LAUNCH; ONE LOST IN SOUND

Seven of Fishing Party Saved After Schooner Runs Down Boat Off City Island.

ALL THROWN INTO WATER

Small Boat Had Anchored Near Bell Buoy—Captain Held as Police Seek Bronx Merchant.

One man was missing last night and seven other persons were rescued when a three-masted schooner, the M. J. Taylor, loaded with coal and outward bound to her home port in Nova Scotia, crashed into a twenty-six-foot fishing launch two miles east off City Island at 2:30 o'clock yesterday afternoon.

The launch sank to the water line and was towed ashore. Captain Johnson Beetis of Amherst, Nova Scotia, commander of the sailing vessel, was arrested on a technical charge of homicide.

The missing man is Emil Jensen, 36 years old, a dealer in electric supplies, of 3,252 Giegrich Place, the Bronx. In his launch, the Hannah, he set sail yesterday afternoon with his wife and six friends for a holiday fishing trip. They anchored off Pilot Street, City Island, between Harts Island light and a bellbuoy.

The schooner, traveling under sail in a brisk northwest wind and favored by a full tide, rammed the rear of the launch squarely. The force of the collision tossed the occupants of the smaller craft into the water. All were injured and were treated after being taken ashore. They were:

ROBERT HANSEN, 42, of 3,252 Giegrich Place; lacerations of hands.

WILLIAM F. PRIESLEY, 48, of 4,358 East 177th Street, the Bronx; abrasions of both legs.

WILLIAM J. PRIESLEY, 16, his son; submersion.

JOHN WILSON, 51, of 4,362 East 117th Street; laceration of hand.

ELEANOR WILSON, 45, his wife; lacerations of legs.

ELEANOR WILSON, 14, their daughter; laceration of arm.

The schooner backed off and cast anchor. The crash and cries of those floundering in the water was heard on City Island. Police Launch 9, the tug Portchester and numerous pleasure craft put off to the rescue. Within a few minutes all but Jensen had been picked up and taken to the Robert Jacob shipyard near Pilot Street. After treatment by Dr. Falkenburg of Fordham Hospital, the injured went to their homes.

The helmsman, Albert Barkhouse of Kempville, Nova Scotia, and the lookout, Thomas Henderson of Spencer Island, Nova Scotia, told the police that they had not seen the launch.

There was a slight possibility, the police said, that Jensen had been picked up by one of the pleasure craft without the rescue having become known to them. Grappling for the body was begun.

An investigation of the accident will be made by the local United States steamboat inspector.

SPEED OF SHIP SAVES APPENDICITIS VICTIM

Cable Vessel Lord Kelvin Rushes Navigator to Halifax, 530 Miles, in 44 Hours.

A successful race against time and appendicitis by a ship more than 500 miles at sea was told in wireless messages made public yesterday by the Western Union Telegraph Company. Hurkert C. Walmsley, navigator, whose right side became inflamed from appendicitis while directing the operations of the cableship Lord Kelvin, was rushed to a hospital in Halifax, where he is expected to recover.

Since the severing of transatlantic communication by an earthquake last Autumn the Lord Kelvin has been searching for the loose end of the cable running from Hammels, L. I., to Horta, the Azores. At intervals of about six weeks, it returned to the base at Halifax for refueling.

Last week Navigator Walmsley was stricken with acute appendicitis which required immediate hospital attention. The boilers of the ship were crowded to capacity and the 530 miles to the base was covered in forty-four hours. An operation was performed within an hour after arrival and Walmsley was reported yesterday to be recovering.

Officials of the company reported also completion of repairs of the earthquake damage on the cable from North Sydney, N. S., to Bay Roberts, N. F. A wireless message said the work was done in a few hours in a dense fog 300 miles from shore, under the direction of Acting Captain Delap of the cableship Cyrus Field.

KING WILL NOT ATTEND TROOPING OF COLORS

Duke of Connaught Will Take Birthday Salute for British Monarch on Tuesday.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, May 31.—King George will not attend the ceremony of trooping the colors, celebrating his birthday next Tuesday, it was stated today. While his condition is understood to be satisfactory and he is on the road to complete recovery from his attack of rheumatism, it is felt the strain of sitting astride a horse nearly two hours would not be beneficial. The King's uncle, the Duke of Connaught, will take the salute in his stead.

King George is expected, however, to accompany Queen Mary to the first concert by Toscanini's New York Philharmonic Orchestra here tomorrow afternoon. Next Wednesday, providing the weather is fine, he will witness the running of the historic Derby at Epsom Downs.

Palace, Chicago, Passed to 'Talkies'

CHICAGO, May 31 (AP).—The Palace Theatre, a pillar of vaudeville, passed today into the new order of public entertainment that grew with the "talkies." The only remaining straight vaudeville house in the United States is the Palace Theatre in New York. Both theatres are owned by Radio-Keith Orpheum.

Hackett Sails to Sing Abroad.

Charles Hackett, tenor of the Chicago Civic Opera Company, sailed yesterday for Paris on the Lafayette of the French Line. He said that he has concert engagements in France and Austria and will return in the Fall to sing with Miss Mary Garden in Hamilton Forrest's operatic version of "Camille."

OPEN-AIR CONCERTS FOR PHILADELPHIA

Stokowski Orchestra to Play Nightly for Eight Weeks in Fairmount Park.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, May 31.—On July 7 the Philadelphia Orchestra will begin a series of nightly open-air concerts for eight weeks in a natural amphitheatre that will accommodate 6,000 persons. The concerts are sponsored by the Municipal Bureau of Music, of which Mrs. Clara Barnes Abbott is chief.

A "shell" stadium to seat the orchestra members will be built in Robin Hood Dell, Fairmount Park, and club women are now campaigning to sell 15,000 tickets for the project. The cost of a season ticket is about 22 cents a night.

The movement was started among the musicians themselves, who hoped to make the orchestra a year-round organization. One hundred members have expressed willingness to take a chance on the gate receipts for their salaries. The Musicians' Union has given them permission to do this.

The Bureau of Music announced today that the programs would include "distinguished conductors, large choruses and famous soloists." Leopold Stokowski, regular conductor, has given his consent to the project and designed the "shell" for the amphitheatre.

TOSCANINI REACHES LONDON

Admirers Almost Mob Him—First Concert to Be Given Tonight.

LONDON, May 31 (AP).—Arturo Toscanini and the musicians of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra arrived in London today from a series of triumphal concerts in the music capitals of the Continent.

The conductor, who was accompanied by his wife and two daughters, is paying his first visit to England, though he has many times been invited previously. Many friends met his train at Victoria station and he was almost mobbed by his admirers.

King George, Queen Mary and the Duke of Connaught will attend his first London concert in Albert Hall tomorrow.

GERMAN ACTOR, 6, ARRIVES.

Bobby Burns, Star of Five Movies, Plans to Go to Hollywood.

Bobby Burns, 6-year-old star of five German motion-picture plays made last year, arrived yesterday in the Hamburg-American liner New York to learn English and make American pictures. He is the son of Philip Kaufmann, German representative for Warner Brothers. The boy is accompanied by his mother and his brother and sister, Gerald, 11, and Aileen, 13.

Another motion-picture actor in the ship was Ricardo Cortez on his way back to Hollywood after a vacation in Europe.

ASKS 3 REPUBLICANS AS QUEENS LEADERS

Sasse Would Divide Power and End Factional Fight if De Bragga Retired.

HARVEY SAID TO BE ALOOF

Regular Organization Hopes to Persuade Chairman to Withdraw Resignation.

Formation of a triumvirate to lead the Republican party in Queens and to stop a factional squabble before the November election was suggested yesterday by Frederick Sasse, borough secretary and choice of the Harvey faction as the successor of Joseph H. De Bragga as county chairman. Mr. Sasse and his supporters believe that Mr. De Bragga, who has twice submitted his resignation, is "it" and that the party is leaderless.

This is not the view of the leaders of the regular Republican organization. Mrs. Eva Schumacher, vice chairman, announced that the Republican executive committee would meet on Wednesday or Thursday and that Mr. De Bragga would be urged to withdraw his resignation, which both the executive committee and the county committee have refused to accept.

Mr. Sasse asserted that the statement of George U. Harvey, Borough President, disclaiming interest in a projected primary fight, had been misinterpreted. Mr. Harvey was quoted as saying that, if the Queens Republicans wanted Mr. De Bragga for leader, it would suit him, as he intended to devote all his time to administering the borough government and would leave politics to others.

Denies Peace Plea by Harvey.

"This was hailed by some as a peace overture by Mr. Harvey," Mr. Sasse said. "It is no such thing. Mr. Harvey's attitude always has been that he has nothing to do with politics and that it is his business to run the borough government. The political aspect of the situation he always has left to others. We have made our plans and will go ahead with them for a primary fight. We fully expect to elect enough members to control the county committee.

"But that is not the really important matter before the Queens Republicans. An important election will be held next Fall. Locally we will elect a Surrogate, a County Clerk, two State Senators and six Assemblymen. There will be candidates for the Supreme Court and for Representatives in Congress. Most important of all is the election of a Governor and other State officers.

"No matter who is selected to take De Bragga's place as chairman for the few remaining months of his term, a primary fight is inevitable.

Plan to Go Before Republicans.

"I have thought of a plan I intend to lay before the Republicans. It would be for the selection of a triumvirate to work in Queens for building up the party generally and planning a real, active campaign in the Fall.

"I would suggest that Claudius H. Huston, national chairman, name a representative to this group. Possibly Mrs. Ruth Pratt, Representative Robert Bacon of Nassau County and one or two others could aid the national chairman in the selection of a national representative from among the enrolled Republicans of Queens. William J. Maier, State chairman, could name some one to represent the State committee.

"A method could be worked out of naming a local representative. If necessary each of the two stronger factions in the party might name a local representative. Then that committee could direct the work of building up a strong Queens Republican organization that would function in the election."

Maria Ramos, Novelist, Dies.

LISBON, Portugal, May 31 (AP).—Maria Eugenia Haas Dacosta Ramos, journalist and novelist, whose works have been translated into several languages, died here today.

holders. F. Scott McBride, general superintendent of the league, and D. L. McBride, State superintendent of the league of Minnesota, were stockholders and officers of this fruit juice company. Superintendent McBride is now associated with several State superintendents and with Bishop Cannon in large land speculations in Missouri and Alabama which have lost much money.

At the Statler Hotel, Detroit, on Jan. 16, during the national convention of the Anti-Saloon League, Superintendent F. Scott McBride told me that after his very intimate association with Stanley Kresge at the Houston convention, Kresge contributed $25,000 to him on condition that this be not reported for some time in the future. This contribution does not appear on the league account turned over to the prohibition investigating committee.

In October, 1928, D. L. McBride, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Minnesota, told me that the Republican organization of Minnesota had taken over and was paying all of its men for full time services in the last six weeks' campaign. He said the Republican chairman in Minneapolis was to meet him the next Monday night at Colfax and Fifty-second Streets to turn over to him in cash some $1,500 which was a part of more than $8,000 which his men were being paid by the Republican organization. He said 'this does not go on our books, but the cash is kept in the vault and paid direct to our men." The league has not reported to the investigation committee this use of money in that campaign.

I submit these facts to you for your official use and I stand in readiness to appear before the Senate or any other committee to testify to these facts under oath.

Very sincerely,
EMMET McBRIDE.

Makes Supplemental Statement.

Besides the allegations contained in the letter, Emmet McBride made two statements, one concerning the league and the other concerning his relations with his brothers mentioned in it, which he said are personally friendly. His statement concerning the league follows:

"The vital statistics of the Anti-Saloon League are incomplete. No one knows but that the league was born of the devil rather than God, while some doctors of divinity made out a professional birth certificate, the word of the nurse that it was a mongrel child would be more reliable.

"While there is a shadow of doubt as to where it was born, it is more important as to where it was conceived. It was not in liberty; it was disowned by inalienable rights; it was abandoned by justice. Its wicked parents imposed it upon the doorstep of the church. As the child grew in stature, it lost wisdom and came into disfavor with God and man.

"The Anti-Saloon League is a close company. It is very exactly what its personnel is. It was organized as a machine to carry out the methods of its leaders. The procedure of the league was sort of modified by William H. Anderson, who prepared the Anti-Saloon League Blue Book. But the league has not followed the blue book.

"It has followed the dictates of those who have scrambled into control of the steering wheel of the machine. The machine knocks now with two factions. General Superintendent Baker had groomed Dr. Cherrington for his successor. Because of a grudge, E. H. Wheeler put a usurper in his place. The general superintendent of the league nominates and has elected the State superintendents.

"These State superintendents elect the National Executive Committee. Three years of building up the machine by the present general superintendent made it a steam roller, and so when Dr. Cherrington rightfully would have succeeded Wheeler as national legislative superintendent he was crushed for having been a prince."

Relations With Brothers.

Emmet McBride's statement concerning his relations with his brothers follows:

"I have the most agreeable personal relations with my brother, David L. McBride. He is a wonderfully fine man. He is honest and square, but he has gotten into a crookedly-managed organization which uses money contributed for a good cause in a bad political way. My personal relations with F. Scott McBride are friendly. We are only estranged in politics and business. He is not sincerely a temperance reformer. He has had no lively conscience against the evils of the liquor traffic and little heart interest for those who suffer from drink. His interest has always been the publicity and politics connected with the reform program and with the abundance of contributed money to handle.

"He failed to succeed in the ministry, in which his salary for ten years ranged from $900 to $1,500, and left the ministry to attain a salary of $4,000 plus an automobile given by the league, within a year or two. He gave as his reasons for leaving the ministry: To make more money for his family and to follow the ambitions of his youth."

Emmet McBride told newspaper men when the statements were given out that he had asked Senator Blaine of Wisconsin, wet member of the Senate Lobby Committee who has been principal examiner of the dry witnesses called, that he wished to testify and was told that he would be notified later whether the committee would hear him, the time remaining for its hearings being brief. Senator Blaine, he said, promised to consult Senator Caraway of Arkansas, chairman of the committee.

Neither of these committee members was in town today. Superintendent McBride also was away, reported as being in Des Moines, Iowa.

When the lobby committee adjourned on Wednesday, it was announced that Bishop James Cannon Jr. of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, who is to appear next week, on either Tuesday or Wednesday, would be the last witness called before the committee terminates its investigations.

DENIES BROTHER'S CHARGES.

F. Scott McBride Ascribes Statement to Results of Ill Health.

F. Scott McBride, general and legislative superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, speaking by telephone from his room in the Fort Des Moines Hotel in Des Moines, Iowa, last night, made the following statement in reply to the charges made against him and the organization by his brother, Emmet McBride, in a letter sent to Representative F. H. La Guardia:

"Mr. LaGuardia has released a letter purporting to be from my brother Emmet, containing derogatory statements concerning my brother, D. L. McBride, the Anti-Saloon League and myself.

"Since his severe breakdown some twenty-two years ago, my brother Emmet has been practically an invalid, apparently regaining his health at times only to become again irresponsible, a fact which can be easily verified, it being well known to the family and friends.

"This recurring condition, which I mention in all kindness and with keenest regret, is the explanation of his letter. The charges it contains are absolutely false."

Mr. McBride added that the charges in his brother's letter "were false in retail and wholesale."

FRUIT JUICE FIRM FAILS.

Organizer Was Former Secretary of Illinois Dry League.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, May 31.—Ernest A. Scroggin, former secretary of the Illinois Anti-Saloon League, was organizer of the Ozell Fruit Juice Company, one of many corporations formed in 1912 and 1913 and based on the prospective thirst which was to grip the nation with the success of prohibition.

The company was organized under the liberal corporation laws of Arizona. It was admitted to do business in Illinois July 25, 1913.

The Ozell Company, which was reported to have been promoted by Anti-Saloon League officials, was to extract from the petals of a native plant of the latitudes of Mexico and Hawaii a beverage with a taste like cranberry sauce. The company began operations in Chicago.

More than $800,000 of stock was said to have been sold to members of the Anti-Saloon League and others. The public palate did not take to the cranberry flavor and about five years ago the company passed into a receivership.

David L. McBride is said to have been employed for five years by the Ozell Company and to have dropped $10,000. Records show that Scroggin was arrested at Freeport, Ill., on Feb. 25, 1925, on charges of violating the Illinois securities act. He was held in jail until March 25, when he was released on $2,500 bonds.

Seven informations were lodged against him in Freeport charging violations of the blue-sky law. He was charged with selling stock in the Equity Grocery Company of Milwaukee.

75,000 Jam Bureaus to Renew Auto Licenses; Many Turned Away in Last-Minute Rush

In a last-minute rush to renew their automobile licenses, more than 75,000 tardy operators and chauffeurs jammed the main and branch offices of the Bureau of Motor Vehicles throughout the city yesterday. Although the official compilation of the total number of license renewals made in the past few weeks was not complete, estimates place the number between 750,000 and 800,000.

The bureaus opened at 9 o'clock and closed at noon. Lines, in many cases extending for blocks, were formed long before the offices were opened and were augmented as the morning progressed. Special details of police handled the applicants.

Final compilations were made in Brooklyn and in Richmond. In the former borough seven branch offices under the supervision of Henry B. Cocheu, district director, handled 231,638 renewal applications. Four branches in Richmond, under County Clerk James L. Vail, reported 36,000 renewals. County Clerk Edward W. Cox of Queens said about 75,000 licenses were renewed at the four offices in that borough.

Officials issued a warning last night to owners who have failed to renew their licenses. Any motorist operating a car without proper credentials, they said, would have to furnish evidence of financial responsibility in the amount of at least $5,000 before he could obtain new licenses.

In Manhattan the greatest number of applicants was handled at the main office of the bureau at 220 West Fortieth Street. Several hundred clerks worked at top speed throughout the morning. Despite their efforts, however, several thousands postponed renewing their licenses, preferring to let their cars remain idle temporarily rather than lose a holiday.

200,000 Albanians Flee Census, Fearing Army Duty and Taxes

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

TIRANA, Albania, May 31.—Fearing it might lead to their being enrolled for military service or render them liable to the attentions of tax gatherers, some 200,000 of Albania's estimated 1,000,000 population fled into the woods and mountains when an attempt was made to take the country's first census.

Anticipating resistance of a kind which has had many parallels in the history of uncultivated peoples, the Albanian authorities had ordered the people to stay in their houses on the census day and coffee houses were closed to remove the temptation to absent themselves. However, as was the case with the first census of Kemalist Turkey and that taken by Hungary 150 years ago, these measures proved only partly successful, 833,000 inhabitants being registered.

OPPOSE RAIL MERGERS WHICH MAKE MEN IDLE

Officers of Locomotive Engineers Will Bring Up Subject at Cleveland Convention.

CLEVELAND, May 31 (AP).—Two thousand railroaders from over North America were gathering here tonight for the triennial convention of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, which will discuss principally the effect of mergers and modern inventions upon the security of their jobs.

The convention opens Monday and continues for nearly a month. A membership of 80,000 from 917 divisions located as far south as the Rio Grande and as far north as Canada will be represented.

Officials of the brotherhood said they would express to the delegations their opposition to the railroad mergers that result in abandonment of lines and the consequent laying off of men and the breaking up of homes. They point to the fact that 40,000 firemen are out of work today.

Modern inventions which resulted in economics to the roads are going forward at such a rapid rate that the problem of unemployment has become acute, they said. Officials will urge that there must be some adjustment either in slowing down the progress of invention or in the adoption of the shorter working day. They will discuss a basic working day of six hours and outline a program looking forward to its adoption.

The work of the brotherhood during the last three years will be reviewed and policies for the next three years formulated.

CULLUM GOLD MEDAL AWARDED TO GERMAN

Professor Hettner of Heidelberg Is Honored by American Geographical Society.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

HEIDELBERG, May 31.—Professor Alfred Hettner, noted German geographer, is the recipient of the Cullum Gold Medal, awarded by the American Geographical Society.

The medal will be delivered to him by Ambassador Sackett on Monday.

Professor Alfred Hettner of the University of Heidelberg is the twenty-seventh recipient of the Cullum Gold Medal of the American Geographical Society of New York. According to Dr. Isaiah Bowman, president of the society, the medal is awarded from time to time to those "who distinguish themselves by geographical discoveries or in the advancement of geographical science."

The medal was established by Major Gen. George W. Cullum, vice president of the American Geographical Society from 1877 until his death in 1892. The first award was made to Robert E. Peary in 1896 and others who received it included Fridtjof Nansen, Robert Bell, George W. Goethals and Henry Fairfield Osborn.

Professor Hettner has been with the University of Heidelberg as Professor of Geography since 1899 and is considered one of the leading German geographers. He is 66 years old and was connected with the University of Leipzig and the University of Tübingen before assuming his present post.

During the ten years from 1880 to 1890 he traveled widely in South America, and in 1895 founded the Geografische Zeitschriftung, of which he is the editor. He has also published several books on geographical studies.

Presentation of the medal will be made at the university by Ambassador Sackett, who will represent the society.

The Same COWARD Shoe Stores

It would not have been possible for James S. Coward, his son, or his grandson, to have built such a great business as the Coward Shoe business is today without having had faithful employees.

Many of the men in the Coward Shoe Stores started to work for James S. Coward as boys, received their early training under him, and helped to carry on the business under his personal direction.

You have seen these men in the Coward Shoe Stores ... men who have spent their lives in fitting and planning comfortable shoes ... men who have grown into important positions in the Coward organization.

Any day you walk into a Coward Shoe Store it will be the same Coward Shoe Store you have always known.

JAMES S. COWARD
Creator of the Original Comfort Shoe

As a tree grows, taking its nourishment from the soil, and the sun, and the air, so this great business has grown. Its roots are the ideals, the principles of the founder, James S. Coward. And from them have grown the three greatest single retail shoe stores in the world.

It would follow logically and reasonably, then, that the principles of the past should be the beacon guides of the future:

Good Shoes—shoes such as James S. Coward so painstakingly made in those early years over his work-bench.

Comfortable Shoes—The ideal that James S. Coward worked for, the ideal that has been the lifeblood of the Coward Shoe.

Fair dealing—for sixty-four years as integral a part of the Coward business as its shoes.

The principles behind the Coward Shoe business today are the same fine principles on which the business was founded.

SHOOT NEGRO IN JAIL, ATTACK GUARDSMEN

Oklahoma Rioters Fire Building and Defy Machine Gun Volleys of Militia.

VICTIM DIES IN HOSPITAL

Husband of Woman Accusing Prisoner Stabs Him as He Lies Unconscious—Four Arrested.

OKLAHOMA CITY, May 31 (AP).—Henry Argo, a Negro, died at 12:40 A. M. today at the University of Oklahoma Hospital here from wounds received at the hands of a mob at Chickasha early this morning. W. H. Burgess, Grady County Commissioner, and Deputy Sheriff W. C. Camp accompanied the Negro here.

The officials said Argo was carried from the jail at Chickasha wrapped in a blanket and that the onlookers apparently believed he was dead and being removed to a morgue.

Governor Holloway directed B. F. Holding, Grady County attorney, and J. Berry King, Attorney General, to take immediate action in prosecuting leaders of the Chickasha mob. The Governor said he would insist upon immediate prosecution so "law and order might be upheld."

"The people of that community and every other in the State must understand that law and order must take their course," the Governor said. "Immediate and vigorous prosecution will be demanded by me."

Negro Removed Through Ruse.

CHICKASHA, Okla., May 31 (AP).—Shot in the head by a member of a mob that stormed the Grady County jail and fought National Guardsmen in an effort to lynch him last night and stabbed later by the husband of a white woman he was alleged to have attacked, Henry Argo, a negro, was placed in an ambulance early today and taken to the University Hospital in Oklahoma City. Reports that the Negro was dead were circulated to give officers a chance to get him out of town.

Machine guns with blank cartridges were fired at the mob in the height of the rioting and tear gas bombs were hurled by National Guardsmen. Attempts to burn the jail were unsuccessful.

G. W. Skinner plunged a knife into the chest of Argo as he lay on a cot in the jail after having been shot in the head by an unidentified member of the mob in his cell. The bullet was fired apparently through a window by a man who climbed vines on the outside of the jail near Argo's cell.

Four Arrests Made.

Skinner was arrested. He said he was glad he stabbed the Negro. Six National Guardsmen were injured in the battle with the mob and several citizens were hurt.

No attempt was made to molest other Negroes. While the rioting was at its height, Negro porters were sweeping a sidewalk a block from the jail. Other Negroes went about their business unharmed.

Mayor Larson said the mob leaders were not among the town's "most substantial element." Sheriff Sankey arrested three of the alleged ringleaders of the mob and placed them in the jail while it was still smoke-filled and water-soaked early today. Later they, with Skinner, were released without bail.

The Negro, wrapped in a sheet, was taken from the jail soon after it was discovered he had been shot. The bullet pierced his skull. Members of the mob, believing him dead, made no effort to molest him. He first was taken to a hospital, where, it was said, attendants declined to receive him. Then he was carried back to the jail. The mob apparently had dispersed at that time and a handful of persons who were believed only to be curious was permitted to loiter about the jail.

Husband Stabs Dying Negro.

Some of these were allowed to go to the second floor, where the Negro lay in his cell. Skinner was among them. He paused over the unconscious Negro and suddenly thrust a knife into the Negro's chest.

The assault was alleged to have been committed in Skinner's dugout home, a mile from town, yesterday. Argo was seized two miles from the city on the highway and brought to jail after identification by Mrs. Skinner. He denied the attack.

When the mob formed, shouting threats of violence against any one that stopped them, Mayor Jess L. Larson attempted to argue with them. But men carrying crowbars got around in back of him as he stood on the jail steps and rammed in the steel doors that had been locked. J. D. Carmichael, city attorney; the Rev. J. W. Bruner and B. F. Holding, county attorney, all pleaded with the mob in vain.

Mob Invades Jail.

Bursting through the heavy doors the crowd surged up the stairs to the steel cell where the Negro was confined. The steel door was immovable, but they began work immediately, prying away the plaster and wood at the side of the door to make an opening.

As they worked the Negro fought them, throwing glass and wood through the bars. He screamed for help and finally wrenched a bar away from a white man, using it on his assailants.

Lieutenant H. G. White, a National Guard officer, failed to quiet the mob. Fire engines were called to fight the crowd with water, but the hose was cut. Telephones to the jail were disconnected and men in search of iron bars with which to fight tore water pipes out of the building. The floors were flooded.

At 10 o'clock a detachment of the National Guard sent to the scene by Governor Holloway arrived under orders to protect property and prisoners at all costs, but to use violence only in case violence first was displayed by the mob.

The National Guard arrived in trucks and for a moment scattered the mob by a volley of blank cartridges from machine guns.

A truck was set afire and the mob attempted to turn it over as members of the Guard took to cover in the building, under a rain of bricks that broke all of the windows and drove the officers to the second floor, where all of the windows were barred so heavily that the guardsmen were virtual prisoners.

The mob stacked a pile of mattresses in a downstairs room. These were soaked in gasoline and a match applied. The smoke lifted to the second floor, choking the guardsmen, and Captain E. R. Smith then gave orders to shoot a way out. The mob permitted the guardsmen to leave the second floor and agreed that the officers could remove all prisoners but Argo. The fire was then extinguished.

VOYAGERS REBELLED AT SKIPPING HAVANA

Violent Protests Reflected Their Disappointment Over Change of Airship's Route.

QUIETED BY ECKENER TALK

Explanation of Fuel Shortage Ended Suspicions, Though Some Felt Full Value Was Not Given.

By GUSTAF KAUDER.

Copyright, 1930, in the United States and Canada by the New York Times Company; elsewhere by Ullstein A.-G. All rights reserved.

The Graf Zeppelin's Pan-American voyage, otherwise so successful, was characterized on the Pernambuco-New York lap by a revolt among the passengers against those directing the destinies of the airship. Perhaps it was not at all justified by the final misfortune which brought about the cancellation of our visit to Havana; but there was also the fact that for several days passengers had been complaining about the manner in which their wishes were disregarded.

Wednesday morning apparently all started out still in the best of humor. We were ordered to the field of Pernambuco for 7 A. M., but rain delayed the start until 11 o'clock. We took advantage of the delay to get two or three breakfasts and many unexpected smokes in the small bar-restaurant of the camp. But meanwhile the poor Graf got soaking wet and heavy in the pouring rain, and the result was that we had to leave with 4,000 kilogramms less fuel than intended. None of us knew then what disagreeable results this would have.

Soon we had passed the last city on the South American continent, Natal, and soon we lost sight of land.

Change of Plans Announced.

Everything seemed all right till Thursday morning. Everybody was already longing for the exotic scenery under the Caribbean moon, but then came the news from the bridge that started the passengers' discontent. First, that we hadn't found the tailwinds so favorable as hoped for, and second, that the shortage of fuel would prevent the long detour to Havana.

Almost immediately the passengers started to protest. If under the prevailing apparently splendid weather conditions the ship couldn't reach Havana, then the whole trip must be beyond the sailing faculties of the Graf and the excursion never should have been announced at all, they said. Things became worse when Captain Flemming—always a bit too grouchy with the passengers—closed up the bridge and gave no one access or explanation. Then almost every one in the cabin was convinced that the trip to Havana had never really been planned at all. But that was not true, for Dr. Eckener had been paying for a whole week for the landing preparations at Havana.

Every one then remembered remarks of officers and crew; how they are longing for Friedrischafen and home, &c., this trip being much more strenuous than the world trip. Vainly Captain Shoemaker endeavored to clear up all those misunderstandings and errors of judgment. Mr. Zwicky, the Swiss, began to speak of suing for damages, the Spaniards were sentimentally hurt because the whole voyage was not leading to any Spanish-speaking country, and it seems that Don Alfonso was to have delivered some warm address from the old motherland to the Cuban brothers.

At last Dr. Eckener himself came to rescue his own affairs and with a long and detailed meteorological and aeronautical explanation succeeded in smoothing out things a bit. Still the whole debate wound up with only a momentary armistice through Dr. Eckener's promise not to decide about Havana before Friday.

Arguments Start Again.

When we reached Barbados, the varying light signals of the excited island Negroes, the exotic charm of the big stars above the Carribean Sea brought back the longing for a new piece of tropical paradise and only rewakened the nostalgia of us air wanderers. The passengers started arguing again. Friday morning at 6 o'clock we passed the green mountains and the sleeping capital of St. Juan, Porto Rico, and were roaring with all five motors and strong tailwinds directly toward New York. There was no longer any thought of showing us at least Miami or the Bahamas; we were headed for the open sea and for the passengers remained only the bleak outlook of three days of watery desert from Pernambuco to Lakehurst and three more days of the same watery desert still to come on the way from Lakehurst home to Sevilla.

Then the storm broke loose. All agreed that this was no value for a $6,000-fare; that some secret was hidden from the passengers which was the real reason why Dr. Eckener was hastening home in such an inconsiderate manner. And in spite of the new wonderful achievement, the proved faultless ability of the Zeppelin for tropical as well as transcontinental and transoceanic voyages, I am afraid Dr. Eckener this time damaged somewhat severely his good cause so far as practical propaganda is concerned. He will now have to think of some new kind of Zeppelin expedition and repay his future passengers with something more substantial than the mere joy of a soul and nerve-curing celestial vagabondage.

I do not want to be misunderstood. Probably the real reason for the passengers' disappointment is the sad fact that a wonderful voyage has to end at all and that one has to return to the nerve-racking methods of old-fashioned travel on earth and water, with pedantic time tables, redcap tin-hunters and so on. But there is no doubt also that Zeppelin travel is already turning to this same "regularity" and is quickly losing the perfume of glorious adventure. Dr. Eckener must make up for it in some other way to satisfy the coming more normal type of Zeppelin passenger.

At the last luncheon aboard, Dr. Eckener received from Mr. Crouse a champagne bowl and goblets. In his speech of thanks he reached a kind of final reconciliation with the passengers-primarily because nobody can resist the really immense personal charm of this great fanatic of a great idea. But even he will not succeed permanently to turn tourism into idealism, and that is the crisis the Zeppelin has now to face.

On the Pan-American voyage the Zeppelin's five motors made altegether 660,000,000 revolutions, running day and night with the same rhythm, a grandiose lullaby of our safety. All that summed up amounts to: Great thought, reliable engine, good craftsmanship, and very poor tactics and diplomacy, thus totaling 100 per cent Germanisin, the father also of the Zeppelin.

Sees Dirigible Line Linking Us to South America—Meets the Backers of Ocean Service Today.

Special to The New York Times.

LAKEHURST, N. J., May 31.—The practical significance of the Graf Zeppelin's latest voyage is that it opens the possibility of the establishment of a regular airship line between the United States and South America, said Dr. Hugo Eckener, commander of the Zeppelin, upon his arrival here today.

Dr. Eckener revealed that tentative plans for such a service may be discussed by him with German and American interests before his departure for Friedrichshafen on Monday.

The interests in question are the Goodyear Rubber Company, the General Motors Corporation, the Goodyear Zeppelin Company, the Pacific Zeppelin Corporation, the National City Company and others. These are the same interests which have joined in the formation of the International Zeppelin Transport Company to establish a regular service between Europe and the United States. Representatives of these interests were at Lakehurst yesterday to greet the German air liner. No conferences were held, however, as Dr. Eckener, fatigued after the Graf Zeppelin's trip, retired immediately to bed following an interview with reporters.

He will confer tomorrow with P. W. Litchfield, president of the Goodyear Rubber Company and the Goodyear Zeppelin Company. The meeting will be at the Sherry-Netherland Hotel in New York.

Regular Service in View.

Captain Ernst Lehman, first officer of the Zeppelin, agreed with Captain Eckener in the statement that a Zeppelin service between the United States and South America was the outstanding practical consequence which may emerge from the trip.

Both men were also confident that the voyage would serve also as an impetus to the establishment of a Zeppelin service between Spain and Brazil. In the opinion of Dr. Eckener such a service, for the present, should be between Seville and Pernambuco, with connections from the latter city by airplane to other points in South America.

Another significant feature of the voyage, as seen by Captain Eckener and Captain Lehman, was the first conquest of the tropics by a lighter-than-air machine. The Zeppelin, they declared, has demonstrated the airworthiness of her type of craft under the peculiar conditions of heat and moisture characteristic of the equatorial regions, just as this type of craft had already proved her dependability in temperate zones and in polar regions.

Soon after the landing Dr. Eckener, accompanied by F. W. von Meister, representative of the Maybach Motor Company, appeared in the press room of the station and replied to a rapid fire of questions. Seated in a chair facing the crowd of newspaper men, Dr. Eckener, somewhat pale and showing the marks of strain, spoke with particular satisfaction of the manner in which his ship weathered the squall she encountered Friday night after passing the Bermuda Islands, an ordeal which Dr. Eckener called the worst he had ever been through.

Begun in English, the interview soon switched into German, with Mr. von Meister acting as interpreter. Although he speaks English well, Dr. Eckener found it difficult to converse in a foreign tongue in his state of mental weariness. He was alert and buoyant, however, in his replies as he spoke in his own language.

Eckener Estimates Mileage.

"How many miles were covered from Pernambuco to Lakehurst?" Dr. Eckener was asked.

He estimated the distance at first at 3,200 miles, but later computed it at 3,400 miles.

The total distance from Friedrichshafen to Lakehurst, via South America, he estimated at 13,400 nautical miles. The distance was covered in 204½ hours of actual flying.

"How much fuel, if any, did you have left on landing at Lakehurst?" was the next question.

"We had enough fuel left for thirty hours and the same was true of our food supply," Dr. Eckener declared.

At this point he explained that had he followed his original intention to call at Havana, his ship would have been compelled to fight head winds from Florida northward, in which case the fuel supply might not have held out. Dr. Eckener emphasized this point by way of apology to the Cubans, who have been reported much displeased by the failure to land there. Dr. Eckener pointed out also that his fear of a possible fuel shortage as a result of landing at Havana was due to the fact that the Zeppelin could not take on enough supplies on her last refueling at Pernambuco because of a three-day tropical rain.

"It was impossible to take on four additional tons of liquid fuel, which we otherwise would have had," Dr. Eckener declared.

"When will you leave?" was the next question.

"We will leave at 10 o'clock Monday night," Dr. Eckener declared with emphasis, showing that he was determined to keep to the schedule he had in mind. The return trip to Friedrichshafen will be via Seville, Spain.

Test of the Airship.

Asked to say what was the main purpose of his South American trip, Dr. Eckener declared:

"We wanted to see if it was possible to take an airship into extremes of air and heat conditions. We wanted to see whether our ship would prove its mettle under conditions peculiar to the tropics, where we knew we would encounter heavy rains and violent squalls. We are satisfied that our confidence in our ship was not unjustified."

So far as the tropical test was concerned, Dr. Eckener explained, it reached its severest point on the trip between Rio de Janeiro and Pernambuco.

"Here the weather was very bad, indeed," he said, "with terrific squalls and torrents of rain. Without losing ballast, we were able to master these conditions."

"What effect, if any, did the extreme tropical heat have on the ship?" Dr. Eckener was asked.

"None whatever. The ship was and is in perfect condition," was Dr. Eckener's reply. He added that "no repairs of any kind will be necessary."

Following the interview with Dr. Eckener it developed, however, that some repairs were being made to struts supporting the aft port gondola. The damage was done while the ship was being moored at Pernambuco, where temporary repairs were made, which proved inadequate on the voyage to Lakehurst and required attention on the trip northward. It was evident that the damage was not serious and was unlikely to delay the departure.

"Has the flight any connection with the establishment of an airship service to South America?" it was asked.

"This trip will have no particular effect on existing plans for a northern route service between the United States and Europe," Dr. Eckener replied. "It may, however, lead to the establishment of an airship line between the United States, Brazil and other South American countries."

In response to another question, Dr. Eckener then discussed in more detail the weather conditions encountered between Pernambuco and New York.

Met Variable Weather.

These conditions, he said, were "about the average that would be encountered on such a voyage."

"Between Porto Rico and the Bermudas we were particularly favored by tail winds," he said. "But between north of the Bermudas and the Atlantic Coast we had very bad weather, indeed—terrific gusts of wind. In one minute the south wind changed into a very strong north wind. We had had a thirty-mile tail wind and within a short time we encountered a north wind of forty-five miles. Our situation was exactly the same as is the condition of an ocean liner in a very heavy sea. Within three minutes the temperature fell from 20 to 15 degrees centigrade. I never experienced a squall as strong as this particular one. After we had emerged from this trouble we received a message from the Weather Bureau in Washington warning us of the advance of this squall. Unfortunately, we had the confirmation ahead of the message. The ease with which our ship negotiated this difficulty convinced me that she can ride through any weather."

Before closing the interview Dr. Eckener expressed much satisfaction with the new moving mooring mast at Lakehurst.

"Until today I had only a theoretical knowledge of this mooring mast," he said, "and although it seemed to me an excellent device I had no idea that it would prove its value so completely as it did today. I feel sure that with greater experience in the handling of the new mooring mast it will be possible to land these ships with a minimum of effort and of man power."

The commander said also he wished to deny published reports that either he or the Zeppelin company charged admission fees to the landing field of the Graf Zeppelin at Rio de Janeiro, a circumstance which had been reported as having aroused the ire of the Brazilians.

"The owners of the landing field made this charge and we had absolutely nothing to do with it," he declared heatedly.

Dr. Eckener added that the Zeppelin's quick departure from Rio was due to his desire not to delay the return trip to Pernambuco and the voyage northward.

Following the line of a large part of Dr. Eckener's interview, Captain Lehman declared that so far as the Graf Zeppelin was concerned she has proved that the tropics have no more terrors for her than other climates.

"All we need to know are the meteorological conditions," he said in urging the advisability of a service between the United States and South America. "From this point of view the present voyage of our ship was a pioneering one and in the nature of a climatic exploration. We proved the worth of our ship and the need of more research of equatorial weather conditions. From the practical viewpoint I consider the present voyage of the Graf Zeppelin more important than her trip around the world.

"What pleases me greatly is the manner in which our engines have again withstood the test. The reliability of our engines is what I always like to think of."

20 PASSENGERS HERE ON AIR LINER

Graf Zeppelin Carried a Total of 33 on Different Stages of the Voyage From Germany.

19 BOOKED ON RETURN TRIP

Ten of These Made the Journey Eastward—Forty-two in the Vessel's Crew.

Special to The New York Times.

LAKEHURST, N. J., May 31.—The Graf Zeppelin arrived at Lakehurst with twenty passengers today, but in the course of her long trip from Friedrichshafen a total of thirty-three persons enjoyed her accommodations for at least part of the flight.

Since nineteen passengers, nine of them new ones, are already booked to make the homeward journey to Europe from Lakehurst, the airship will have carried at least forty-two different passengers on her round trip. A crew of forty-two also is being carried throughout the entire flight.

FLIGHT HIGHLY PRAISED IN OFFICIAL CIRCLES

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 31.—The flight of the Graf Zeppelin called forth high praise today in official circles which had followed the course of the dirigible with intense interest.

The Navy Department, which cooperated in plans for the voyage, was delighted. Its contacts with the Zeppelin on its flight north from Brazil had been excellent, it reported.

The Weather Bureau also found cause for satisfaction in the special forecasts it had transmitted to the Graf Zeppelin, particularly yesterday, when the dirigible was warned of the squall condition it would enter late last night off the American coast. The Weather Bureau is also to prepare special forecasts for the voyage across the North Atlantic to Germany and will transmit them in time for Dr. Eckener to gauge the weather conditions he will encounter before he leaves.

Ernest Lee Jahncke, Acting Secretary of the Navy, said:

"This was a splendid flight, and I wish to extend the navy's congratulations to Dr. Eckener and his crew."

Rear Admiral William A. Moffett, Chief of the Navy Bureau of Aeronautics, said in a statement:

"This new flight of the Graf Zeppelin under new and trying conditions in the tropics, both north and south of the Equator, again demonstrates the practicability and usefulness of the dirigible. Let us hope that the doubters will see a light and help the navy complete its two 6,500,000-cubic-foot airships and the proposed base for them on the Pacific Coast so that our country will take its rightful place in this new field of transportation. The believers in airships all congratulate Dr. Eckener and his crew on their accomplishment."

ZEPPELIN LANDS, BATTLED SQUALLS

between the two giant airships, until the Graf Zeppelin turned sharply about from the southeast and directed her nose toward the spot where the landing crew was waiting to receive her. The Goodyear blimp Vigilant then took the lead in the procession, in which more than a score of airplanes, many of them flying low, participated.

Eckener Weary But Happy.

Weary but happy at his success in bringing his ship through one of the worst tests to which she was ever put, worse, he said, than when the Graf Zeppelin tore a fin on one of her earlier crossings, Dr. Eckener was unaware of the damage to the struts of the rear gondola, which was observed only after the officers and crew had left the ship. The explanation of what caused the damage and its repetition on the trip northward was given by W. F. von Meister, American representative of the Maybach Motor Works and the Luftschifbau. He said the damage was not important and that to avoid the delay, Dr. Eckener had contented himself with temporary repairs and proceeded to Lakehurst from Pernambuco. Mr. Meister pointed out that the gondola itself had suffered no injury on the flight from Brazil, despite the extremely rough weather.

Dr. Eckener spoke of the Graf Zeppelin in high praise and told of the windstorms and drenching rains that beat upon her in South America and in the North Atlantic. The most serious blow she received, he said, was last night between the Bermudas and the Atlantic Coast.

"At half past 8 last night," he said triumphantly, "we ran into a squall which was the worst I have ever experienced. The ship dipped like this," he gestured, pointing at a very sharp angle. "But," he added with a smile, "none of the passengers was seasick or appeared to be any the worse for the experience."

Lehman Tells of Squall.

Captain Ernst Lehman, first officer of the dirigible, explained that the severe lurch of the ship in the sudden squall was due to a large extent to the inadequate experience of the man at the wheel, a comparative newcomer on the Zeppelin, who failed to see the coming danger and steer the craft accordingly.

"Fortunately, I was beside him and was able to order him not to attempt to right the ship too violently, which would have proved another severe shock," Captain Lehman said. "I must say, however, the passengers behaved magnificently, for while all the crockery on the tables in the dining saloon went crashing off the tables, and the walls of the ship shook as if struck by an elemental force of unheard-of proportions, the passengers, men and women alike, failed to reveal the slightest fear or concern. They proved themselves good Zeppelin fans."

Captain Lehman's statement was borne out by statements of the passengers themselves, who refused to see in their experience anything out of the ordinary.

"I can't give you any harassing impressions, for there weren't any," said the Infante Alphonso, young cousin of the King of Spain.

"Oh, yes, it was rough, but not enough to frighten one," was the statement of Mrs. Laura Durston of Syracuse, N. Y.

Mrs. Mary Pierce, the second of the three women on board, said it was simply a case of "getting into a little bad weather."

"It whirled us around and banged us up a bit, and it rained a lot and got pretty bumpy," she said. To prove that her experience has not dampened her ardor for the air, Mrs. Pierce, immediatey upon being released from the customs, proceeded in an airplane to Roosevelt Field in company with William B. Leeds and another passenger.

"There was something in the Graf, its size and stability and the confidence that Dr. Eckener inspires, which apparently prevents any idea of being afraid entering one's mind," said George Crouse of Syracuse. "We were all up last night, sitting in the saloon. And after it was all over, we went peacefully to bed. I slept like a baby."

Other passengers spoke in similar vein.

Customs Examination Speeded.

The customs examination of the passengers, under the direction of William N. Biester, Deputy Collector of the Port of Philadelphia, who headed a squad of inspectors from the Philadelphia office who had had experience with passengers of the Graf Zeppelin on previous occasions, worked with speed and precision, and it was not long after the passengers had been brought from the hangar in a bus to the Welfare Building to be examined that they were free to go.

There was no cargo to speak of on board the Graf Zeppelin, except a large shipment of mails. The mail cargo was estimated at $150,000, of which the Zeppelin Company will receive $100,000 from the Postoffice Department. It was emphasized that the ship, which cost $800,000 to build, has already paid for itself largely from the postal revenues received through the cooperation of the United States Government.

One Hurt Landing the Ship.

The only feature that marred for a moment the otherwise perfect landing of the Zeppelin was the injury of W. J. Kingsland, a chief carpenter's mate, who was one of a dozen men who were holding down the tail of the big ship as she was being wheeled into the hangar, when a sudden gust of wind lifted it, with a number of men clinging to the railing of the rear gondola. Kingsland was one of the men who jumped from a height of about thirty-five feet. He was slightly stunned and received some cuts on the face and body. Extra men were ordered to the task and the ship brought under control. It was later believed that the difficulty in managing the tail and rear gondola in the operation of bringing the ship into the hangar may have been due to the broken struts.

The official reception committee which greeted Captain Eckener and his ship consisted, in addition of Commander M. P. Pierce, U. S. N., commanding the station, of Commander F. T. Berg, U. S. N., Commander A. H. Dresel, Lieut. Commander F. P. Traynor, Lieut. Commander C. E. Rosendahl, Paul W. Litchfield, president of the Goodyear Zeppelin Company; Jerome C. Hunsaker, vice president of the Goodyear Zeppelin Company; Frederick M. Harpham, vice president of the Goodyear Zeppelin Company, and Ward T. Van Orman, an official of the Goodyear Zeppelin Company.

Among those who greeted Captain Eckener was his son, Knute Eckener, the young man who repaired the broken fin on one of the ship's voyages to Lakehurst. Young Eckener has been studying Zeppelin building at Akron, Ohio, in the plant of the Goodyear Company. He said he had not yet made up his mind whether he would go with his father on the return trip to Germany.

The total cost of the Zeppelin's visit to Lakehurst, including refueling and docking charges, is estimated at $25,000.

TRIP THRILLED ALL; A FEW ARE CRITICAL

Suspicion Voiced That Eckener Was More Eager to Set Record Than Please Them.

AIRSHIP'S WORTH PRAISED

Leeds and Durell Enthusiastic About Voyage—Other Passengers Stress Comforts of Air Travel.

Ten of the Graf Zeppelin's passengers came to New York on the special train of the Central Railroad of New Jersey which had been waiting on the siding behind the Lakehurst hangar since early yesterday morning. The train left soon after the last of them had gone through the customs, run the gauntlet of still and motion picture photographers and seen to their baggage. It was 9:45 A. M. when the last sacks of Zeppelin mail for New York were put in the baggage car.

While the passengers seemed agreed that the trip as a whole had been most thrilling, several voiced dissatisfaction that the scheduled visit to Havana had been omitted. The strongest expression of this feeling was by Federico Garcia Sanchez, a news lecturer in Spanish theatres and cinemas, who described himself as "editor of 'El Clamor,' a paper for the illiterate." He suggested that the hope of a new speed record rather than a threatened fuel shortage was the reason for omitting the Havana visit.

"The trip as far as Pernambuco was satisfactory in every sense," he declared. "But from Pernambuco to New York we have been the victims of Commander Eckener, who is devoted to the worship of records. I admire Dr. Eckener as a technician, but I think that he's not a good tour conductor."

Swiss Is Also Critical.

Friederich Zwicky, a textile manufacturer from Zurich and the only Swiss person aboard the airship, also said he thought Dr. Eckener's reason for omitting Havana was that he wanted to make a new record from Pernambuco to New York.

"Everybody was dissatisfied at not seeing Havana because it was omitted after it had been on the program," he declared. "I thought it was practically the most important part of the trip to see the West Indies and Florida and I was much disappointed." Mr. Zwicky said the last night on the airship was "very restless" because the ship hit air pockets a number of times and the bow dropped very sharply.

Lady Drummond-Hay, when told of some of the passengers' criticisms of Dr. Eckener, discountenanced them. "In view of the fact that there was not enough reserve fuel and that unfavorable weather was predicted ahead, Dr. Eckener was quite right to do as he did," she said. "I've never heard of Dr. Eckener's doing anything not in the interest of the passengers." She also quoted Captain Harry E. Shoemaker, U. S. N., of Lakehurst as having supported her in this view.

"I saw so many interesting sights before that personally I was perfectly content," was the way Dr. Hermann Badt of the German Ministry of the Interior, Prussian representative on the Reichsrat and director of the Department of Law and Constitutional Questions of the Prussian Government, declared.

William B. Leeds, veteran Zeppelin voyager, left Lakehurst in a twenty-passenger Sikorsky amphibian bound for Roosevelt Field, accompanied by Mrs. Mary Pierce and Darke B. Matos, the Brazilian. They arrived at the Long Island airport shortly before 2 P. M. Asked about the Zeppelin trip, Mr. Leeds said:

"There was a severe wind shift off the Virginia Capes last night, but the ship proved again, with the handling she got, what a great old ship she is."

Durrell Well Satisfied.

Joseph H. Durrell, vice president of the National City Bank, said this had been his first Zeppelin ride and that although he had flown in airplanes before "this is even better."

The Infante Don Alfonso de Orleans, first cousin of the King of Spain, a tall, sun-burned young man who spoke in perfect English, declared, before he left by plane for Washington, that he was immensely pleased with the trip.

"All I can say," he declared, "is that traveling in a Zeppelin is hardly traveling. You have all comforts, few inconveniences and very little noise, much less than on a fast train. In fact, instead of traveling, you appear to stand still and the country passes by. One sleeps very well and eats too much."

Regular airship service between North and South America was predicted by Senor Mattos, who said:

"By the fastest trip it takes thirteen days to come here from Rio de Janeiro. Compare that with the three or four days required for a Zeppelin trip. Between Europe and Brazil there will also surely be an airship line to cut down the immense distance that now separates us from our fellow-Latin countries. This is the only really comfortable way of traveling great distances."

Valentin F. Boucas, Brazilian representative of the International Business Machines Corporation, said that the drink, food and talk aboard the Zeppelin had been of the best and nothing more could be desired. "I don't smoke," he said, when asked if he missed a cigar.

George Crouse of Syracuse said this had been his fourth trip in an airship and that he had enjoyed it more than any of the earlier ones.

Auto Tires for King of Spain In Zeppelin Cargo for Return

Special to The New York Times.

LAKEHURST, N. J., May 31.—Although the Graf Zeppelin carried only her passengers, their baggage and her rich philatelic cargo on the trip here, the assemblage of miscellaneous assortment of freight for her return trip has already been begun. The dirigible's passenger and freight agents, the Hamburg-American Line, has about seventy items of cargo awaiting the ship today.

A set of five tires and tubes for the King of Spain's automobile, and consigned to Don Carlos de Salamanca at Madrid, is to be carried as far as Seville. Two portable calculating machines are being sent from Orange, N. J., to Berlin. These were the first items of freight to be accepted for the trip and bear bill of lading Nos. 1 and 2. Other items were two packages of paper drinking cups and two lots of sample dresses.

150,000 SEE THE SHIP AS REPAIRS ARE PUSHED

Eckener Praised for a Perfect Landing—Boy Scouts Get Post of Honor in Work.

Special to The New York Times.

LAKEHURST, N. J., May 31.—As the Graf Zeppelin lay snugly in her chocks in the huge hangar at the air station today, 150,000 persons passed her silver flanks in long queues and peered into the salon and cabin windows.

While Dr. Eckener and his watch officers rested in naval quarters here mechanics and enginemen were busy in the motor gondalas, taking down for overhaul or repair parts of the powerful Maybach motors. Far in the stern, where her tapering lines commenced to slope upward to the great control elevators, the Graf's crew worked to repair broken gondola struts. Amidships other men were busy handling fuel lines as some of the 800,000 cubic feet of fuel gas available here for the dirigible was being forced into the ship's bag. This gas is not the usual "blau" gas mixture favored in Germany but is a mixture of one-third hydrogen and two-thirds pyrofax, as devised by the Carbide and Carbon Chemicals Corporation, which fueled the dirigible at Pernambuco.

The crowds began swarming to Lakehurst this morning soon after the news had spread that the Zeppelin was safely in the hangar. Marine sentries stopped all visitors' cars at the outer edge of the reservation, where automobiles were parked in a mile-long row.

As the air station awoke from a sleepy afternoon of rest to another "zero hour" at sundown, when the Los Angeles, back from her trip to the Curtiss marine air races in Washington, was landed, continued praise was heard for the smart manner in which Dr. Eckener landed his ship this morning. Scores of officers agreed that the landing was "one of the best I have ever seen." Dr. Eckener manoeuvred his craft so close to the ground that it was not necessary to throw out the customary line to pull the ship down.

A proud share in the honor of landing the Zeppelin belonged to a Lakewood troop of Boy Scouts, known as the only Boy Scout troop for lighter-than-air work in the country. They were roused from their beds early this morning, together with the regular station personnel, and had for the first time the distinction of handling the main cord on the control cabin, a position of honor. The Lakewood troop was assisted by another local troop and by a Sea Scout unit from New Egypt.

The navy dirigible Los Angeles returned here tonight at 9:14 o'clock after manoeuvres over the Anacostia Air Station at Washington, D. C. The ship was attached to the new mobile mooring mast while it was still under power.

SPECIAL STAMP DIES GIVEN TO ECKENER

Postmaster General's Aide Presents Album—Valued at $5,000 as Only One of Kind.

Special to The New York Times.

LAKEHURST, N. J., May 31.—An album containing the only die proofs made of the three special stamps the Postoffice Department issued for the Graf Zeppelin's flight was presented to Dr. Hugo Eckener soon after his arrival by W. Irving Glover, Second Assistant Postmaster General in charge of air mail and representing Postmaster General Brown. An inscription signed by the Postmaster General, commemorative of the flight and commending Dr. Eckener's contributions to aviation, was printed in the front of the album.

In accepting the book Dr. Eckener said he would always treasure it and asked Mr. Glover to express to Postmaster General Brown his appreciation of "the great support the Postoffice Department has given on this trip as well as on past flights."

Mr. Glover said later that $5,000 would be a conservative valuation for the book, as it is the only one of its kind.

The three special stamps prepared by the government were for 65 cents, $1.30 and $2.60. The 65-cent stamp is issued for use on post cards mailed from this country to Friedrichshafen for the final leg of the journey and the $1.30 stamp will be available for a letter.

The Postoffice Department announced that 1,000,000 copies of each denomination would be printed and after the departure of the Zeppelin all unsold remainders would be destroyed. In the opinion of stamp dealers there will not be many left to destroy. On the first day that the new stamps were available at the bureau of the Philatelic Agency in Washington the sale aggregated more than $100,000.

Several thousand letters and post cards carried from Friedrichshafen will be delivered during the coming week to collectors and dealers in all parts of the United States. The postage for the trip was $2.60 for a letter and $1.30 for a post card.

Mail carried by the Zeppelin on its first flight to America in October, 1928, is worth at present about $8 for a letter and $5 for a post card.

SEES OCEAN AIR LINE WITHIN THREE YEARS

Naval Observer on Graf Zeppelin Confident of Service Between Spain and South America.

PRAISES SHIP IN STORM

Tells of New Dirigible Being Built in Germany Equaling That of Navy's Here.

Special to The New York Times.

LAKEHURST, N. J., May 31.—Predicting an assured future for dirigibles as passenger and mail carriers, Captain Harry E. Shoemaker, U. S. N., naval observer on the Graf Zeppelin's trip from Friedrichshafen to Lakehurst, estimated late today that a regular Zeppelin transatlantic passenger service between Seville, Spain, and South America would be established in three years.

In hailing the future of the lighter-than-air ships Captain Shoemaker, who is the highest ranking American naval officer to have voyaged on the Zeppelin, disclosed that the Zeppelin works at Friedrichshafen have under construction a ship which is to be much larger than their present pride. Three of the rings of the new ship were already in place in the great hangar in Germany, he said, and their size indicated that the new Zeppelin would probably equal in bulk the new dirigible now being built at Akron, Ohio, for the navy.

He Praises Dirigibles.

Captain Shoemaker, who was assigned to the naval air station at Lakehurst as student, was ordered to Germany some weeks ago to return to this country aboard the Graf Zeppelin. For the first time in the history of the Graf Zeppelin's flights across the Atlantic the naval observer's passage was paid for by the Navy Department. On all previous trips the naval officer assigned to the dirigible had been entertained as Dr. Hugo Eckener's guest. When the navy for the first time revoked free privileges and made the big airship a paying guest at Lakehurst, its representative was treated as the other passengers and a fare was required.

Captain Shoemaker was outspoken in his praise of lighter-than-air ships and in his hopes for their future.

He pointed out that the Graf Zeppelin on its recent trip had cut down the mail time from Berlin to Pernambuco to seventy-six flying hours. He drew a comparison between this time of a little over three days and the best previous record by rail and steamer of ten days.

Dr. Eckener, he declared, was probably considerably influenced in his decision to take the South American route by his hope of demonstrating to the Latin countries the feasibility of dirigible mail and passenger service. He defined one of the purposes of the trip as that of interesting Brazilian capitalists in the establishment of a regular southern transatlantic dirigible service. In his prediction as to the future establishment of such a route, Captain Shoemaker gave no details. He added that he thought the establishment of a similar route across the North Atlantic was only a matter of time, and agreed with Commander Jerome C. Hunsaker, U. S. N. R., vice president of the Goodyear Zeppelin Company, that the passage of contemplated legislation giving air-mail contracts to such projected lines would greatly facilitate the inception of such aerial schedules.

Discounts Bad Weather.

The dirigible has now reached a state of development where "bad weather is of but little more concern than it is to an ocean liner," in Captain Shoemaker's opinion. To support this he pointed to all of the recent successful trips of the Graf Zeppelin, in many of which she successfully rode out storms.

The low pressure area through which the Zeppelin passed off the Virginia Capes early today shortly before reaching Lakehurst was "the worst storm I have ever been in in the air," the Captain said, adding that the Zeppelin had ridden through the storm smoothly, with only occasionally lurching and pitching.

"At times we were bucking a sixty-mile wind," he said, "and at first when we were on the fringes of the storm area we were helped along by a wind almost that high. Zeppelins today are built much more strongly than the wrecked Shenandoah and have demonstrated their ability to take rough weather. Usually they can manoeuvre to avoid storms; if not, they can nearly always withstand them unless they encounter line squalls of tremendous severity."

Captain Shoemaker added that the mobile mooring mast used for the first time on the Graf Zeppelin today was only the beginning of mechanical mooring improvements which in time would do away almost entirely with the old-fashioned ground crew.

In crossing the Equator the passengers who passed through the experience for the first time were initiated as full-fledged "air sprites" by the "king of the air," Watch Officer Von Schiller, who, dressed in a capacious sheet, presented each of the novitiates with a large paper "diploma." After the ceremonies the captain reminisced.

All of the passengers were delighted with their experiences, Captain Shoemaker said, and "no one who has ever traveled by airship hesitates to do it again." His enthusiasm found a sympathetic chord in the delighted comments of the other passengers on their trip. It was indicated by other officers at the station that Captain Shoemaker's trip on the Zeppelin and his previous study at Lakehurst were probably preparatory to his assumption of the command of the air station here.

American Flier Forced Back to Guatemala After Take-Off South.

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, May 31 (AP).—A Pan-American Airways radio message says that Captain Lewis Yancey, American flier, today was forced by bad weather to return to Guatemala after an attempt to resume his flight to South America.

Captain Yancey left Guatemala at 9:40 A. M. and returned twenty-five minutes later.

ZEPPELIN LOG NEARS 100,000-MILE TOTAL

Big Dirigible Has Made More Than 60 Voyages, Including World Trip in Record Time.

MANY STORMS WEATHERED

On First Atlantic Crossing in 1928 Ship Was Badly Damaged—Craft Has Proved Its Worth.

The Graf Zeppelin comes to Lakehurst this time with a record of close to 100,000 miles of successful flights behind her. In more than sixty voyages the big airship has made nine of more than 3,000 miles. Six times the Graf Zeppelin has crossed the Atlantic and once the Pacific. She holds the record for any craft or combination of craft for circumnavigating the globe, making the 21,000 miles in twenty-one days from Lakehurst to Lakehurst.

It was late in the Summer of 1928 when the first German Zeppelin constructed since the Versailles Treaty went into effect was ready for the air. On the morning of Oct. 11 Dr. Hugo Eckener, the journalist and economist who became the world's greatest aeronaut, signaled to the Friedrichshafen ground crew to let go and the Graf rose slowly and nosed westward. That first transatlantic flight was beset with difficulties of wind and weather that verged on disaster, nearly involving the master's son, young Knut Eckener, one of the helmsmen on the voyage.

First Trip 6,164 Miles.

Dr. Eckener computed his travel on that maiden transocean voyage at 6,164 miles. The Graf Zeppelin was 111 hours and 38 minutes on the way. Two weeks later the return voyage was started and Dr. Eckener chose the Great Circle course over Newfoundland. Up close to the Arctic Circle the dirigible struck violent winds, so strong that at the end of the voyage the Zeppelin navigator declared his craft was not fit for transatlantic commercial flying. New ships would have to be larger and more powerfully built and engined, he said. In spite of difficulties the airship reached its home port in 68 hours and 46 minutes from Lakehurst.

The next long voyage came in March, 1929, when the Graf Zeppelin flew to Palestine and return, making a non-stop flight of 4,968 miles. In May a second trip to the United States was started, but engine trouble crippled the ship and she turned back. So serious was the trouble that she came down in France with the aid of a detachment of French soldiers. After some repairs the airship returned to Friedrichshafen and it was not until August that she was ready for the long-heralded world flight.

In April, two weeks before her abortive start for America, the Graf Zeppelin had made a round-trip flight to Spain, adding 3,353 miles to her log.

The start on the second voyage to Lakehurst came on Aug. 1, and she made the passage by the southern route in 93 hours, flying 5,185 miles, according to Dr. Eckener's log. Three days were spent at Lakehurst preparing for the world flight and on Aug. 8 the navy ground crew moved the Graf Zeppelin out of the hangar and she sailed.

Fast Start for World Cruise.

To Friedrichshafen she flew in 55 hours and 30 minutes and, with a following wind much of the way, averaged close to 100 miles an hour. It was a splendid start for the world cruise, and after refueling at the home station the ship started again. The next leg was the longest of the flight, across Russia and Asia to Kasumiguara Airport, near Tokyo—6,800 miles in 101 hours and 53 minutes.

On Friday, Aug. 23, the dirigible left Japan for Los Angeles. Flying a modified Great Circle course which brought her near the North American coast above Seattle, she completed the 5,500-mile flight to Los Angeles in 78 hours and 58 minutes. Coming by the southern route the airship appeared over El Paso, then swung north over Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland and Akron, arriving at Lakehurst on the morning of Aug. 29.

The return flight to Friedrichshafen was uneventful and was made in 67 hours and 9 minutes.

Prior to the present expedition the Graf Zeppelin had carried a total of more than 1,600 passengers and returned to her owners thousands of dollars for the transportation of mail and express. Exact figures on her cost of maintenance and income-producing ability have never been made public, but her performance record is the basis for the forming of two airship transport lines with the backing and cooperation of the National City Bank and other banking houses interested in aeronautical development.

KINGSFORD-SMITH ON WAY.

Flies to England From Holland to Start Atlantic Attempt.

CROYDON, England, May 31 (AP).—Captain Charles Kingsford-Smith landed here in the Southern Cross at 12:40 P. M. today. The transpacific flier arrived from Amsterdam on his way to Ireland and is planning to take off on a transatlantic flight from there in the near future.

Captain Kingsford-Smith flew over with three companions, who will accompany him on his forthcoming attempt. His airplane was completely overhauled while in Holland.

"We shall stay for a couple of days in London and then fly to Ireland," the captain said. "The start of our Atlantic flight is up to the weather. We shall get off at the earliest possible moment."

DUBLIN, May 31 (AP).—Soldiers at the Curragh camp today began the voluntary work of leveling the ground for Captain Kingsford-Smith's take-off on his forthcoming Atlantic flight.

Captain Saul, Irish member of the crew, is making charts for the flight by permission of the British Air Ministry.

AIR CUSTOMS MEN SET SPEED RECORD

Examine Baggage on Zeppelin in Fifteen Minutes, Cutting Former Time by One-Half.

ALL PLANTS ARE SEIZED

Forty-two Sacks of Mail, 125,000 Pieces in All, Bear $150,000 in Postage.

Special to The New York Times.

LAKEHURST, N. J., May 31.—Philadelphia's veteran customs staff of "Zeppelin inspectors" broke all their previous records in the examination of the passengers' baggage this morning. From 8:55 A. M., when Joseph H. Durrel, vice president of the National City Bank, the first passenger to have his belongings examined, laid his baggage on the table to the examination of the last passenger's typewriter and luggage, only fifteen minutes elapsed.

This cut in half the inspectors' best previous time of half an hour, a mark set on the beginning of the Graf Zeppelin's round-the-world flight last year. The examination the previous year "took much, much longer," an inspector said, as the staff had not then perfected a technique for their specialized work.

Those who watched the procedure today in the temporary customs house arranged in the station's Welfare Building, commented on the thoroughness and speed with which the examinations proceeded. None of the passengers, however, limited as they were by the weight requirements of air travel, brought much more than their personal belongings and no duties were levied. The customs staff was headed by William H. Biester, Deputy Collector of the Port of Philadelphia, and Acting Deputy Collector John P. McGovern, and it comprised three inspectors and one examiner of customs.

As soon as the dirigible touched the ground Dr. Carroll Fox of the United States Public Health Service, regularly stationed at New York, went aboard and subjected the passengers and crew to the same quarantine inspection undergone by those on any ocean liner. He was followed by Theodore Morgan, the customs boarding officer, Mr. Biester and Plant Quarantine Inspector W. W. Chapman.

The Plant Operation Inspector confiscated everything, from raw vegetables to bouquets, that partook of the nature of a plant. Later these were destroyed. This, it was explained, was done to prevent the importation of any plant pests into the United States.

An improvised postoffice, set up in a corner of the station's machine shop, was meanwhile the scene of a bustling activity under the direction of W. Irving Glover, second assistant Postmaster General at Washington and head of the country's air mail service. Twelve postal clerks handled the forty-two sacks of mail. The Graf Zeppelin's mail consisted of 125,000 individual pieces and bore $150,000 worth of postage, Mr. Glover said. Three sacks contained 5,000 letters and postcards written by the passengers in flight. The rest, picked up by the airship at Friedrichshafen, Seville and Pernambuco, came from almost every country in the world, many pieces being sent from Japan.

Mail destined to go on with the Graf Zeppelin to Europe received a special Lakehurst cancellation and was put back into the bags. The rest was sent to the New York Postoffice for distribution. The mail which the airship was to have dropped at Havana is being sent on to Cuba by plane, Mr. Glover explained.

"It is the greatest assortment of philatelic mail ever handled," Mr. Glover said. "It is safe to say that its philatelic value will be five times its face value of $150,000, or $750,000, inside of five years. I estimate that the Zeppelin Company will receive at least $100,000 from the Postoffice Department for this cargo of mail."

ZEPPELIN'S ARRIVAL DESCRIBED ON RADIO

Wide Hook-up Carries Story of Landing at Lakehurst to Most of the Country.

A bright silver spot in the early morning sky was sighted by a radio announcer from his position atop the great hangar at Lakehurst airport yesterday and a few moments later listeners with sets attuned to the waves of WJZ and associated stations were intercepting a word-picture of another arrival in America of the Graf Zeppelin.

The description began at 6:55 o'clock, Eastern Daylight Time, as the dirigible was approaching Lakehurst, and lasted until the ship was tied down and nearly ready to be walked into the hangar. At 8 o'clock WEAF was switched in the circuit as the local broadcaster to take the place of WJZ, which was scheduled for another program. A network of stations extending nearly across the country was linked with the airport microphones. The radio description ended at about 8:15 o'clock.

Seven microphones were installed at Lakehurst for the event. Three of them were on the roof of the hangar, one at each end and another in the radio compass house. Two more were at each end of the hangar and the seventh in the welfare house nearby. The National Broadcasting Company engineers prepared to catch a description from any point of vantage.

At the time of signing off none of the officers of the Graf Zeppelin had spoken over the radio network. Enthusiastic shouts by the onlookers, the humming of the motors and the commands of the ground crew officers were carried to the radio listeners frequently. Once the announcer described how several of the ground crew were carried a short distance into the air when the airship's nose was being hauled down and the rail which the men were grasping went up. He said one man "dropped about thirty feet but did not seem to be hurt" by the experience. The broadcast was supervised by William Burke Miller, manager of feature events for the National Broadcasting Company.

THIRTEEN MISSING FROM SUNKEN VESSEL

Known Dead Are 3 in Foundering of Craft Carrying Fishermen Off Santa Monica, Cal.

KELP MAY HOLD THE BODIES

Captain Blames Rush of Passengers to One Side for Capsizing of the Ameco.

SANTA MONICA, Cal., May 31 (AP).—Thirteen persons, passengers on the fishing boat Ameco, which foundered three-quarters of a mile offshore Memorial Day, were officially reported missing today after a check of all available reports. Three others are known to have been drowned, the bodies having been recovered last night.

Two Coast Guard boats and three other vessels were searching for the missing this morning. Officials stated that they did not expect the bodies of others who have been drowned to come ashore for days. A great bed of kelp lies between the place where the ship foundered and the shore.

The Known Dead.

BARNETT, C. C., aged 26, a Los Angeles barber.
KELLER, Miss MARGARET, 18, of Santa Monica.
LOCKHARD, JOHN W., of Pasadena, a barber's apprentice.

The Ameco, a 45-foot boat, was capsized by a huge wave which struck it broadside as it headed for shore in a squall. Captain William Lightfoot and some survivors said the rush of passengers to one side to avoid spray was partly responsible for the sinking of the craft.

According to the police seventy persons were aboard the craft, eight more than she was licensed to carry. This point is being investigated.

The fifty-two survivors were brought ashore by other fishing boats which went to the rescue. They were treated in local hospitals and allowed to go home. Some of them suffered no more than a wetting, while others were unconscious and were revived by inhalator squads.

The bodies of Lockhard and Barnett were recovered from the ocean. Miss Keller died ashore from exposure.

An investigation was ordered by Captain S. A. Kennedy of the United States Steamboat Inspection Service. In his account of the tragedy, Captain William Lightfoot of the Ameco said:

"We were under power returning to the docks when suddenly some very big swells were blown up by a strong wind and broke over our bows. Every one rushed to the port side. The effect of the waves and the shift in passengers caused the boat to keel over and she sank almost immediately."

CITY AIRPORT OPENED BY BRISTOL, ENGLAND

All Parts of the Country Are Represented—French and Others Fly From Continent.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, May 31.—One of the biggest civil aviation meetings held in Britain took place at Bristol today when the city opened its new airport. Bristol is the first British city to provide a municipal airport where the organization and flying facilities have not been handed over to a commercial company in the form of a monopoly.

Officials and representatives of all parts of the country were present, including Prince George and the Air Minister, Lord Thomson, Air Vice Marshal Sir Sefton Brancker. Miss Amy Johnson's parents and sisters, who flew from Hull, were the centre of considerable interest.

The meeting was not merely national, for pilots flew planes from France, Germany, Holland, Belgium and Italy.

The French were particularly numerous, having come to participate in Bristol's British-French week. They were headed by the Mayor of Rouen, the French Ambassador and Mme. de Fleuriau, and several Cabinet Ministers.

The airport's landing area exceeds 800 yards in all directions. It is conveniently situated two miles south of the city, and with the new arterial road completed will be only five minutes' from its centre.

New England Lumberjacks Fail; Drive for 2,700 Nets Only Few

CONCORD, N. H., May 31 (AP).—Lumberjacking holds no lure for New Englanders, John S. B. Davie, State Commissioner of Labor, has been forced to conclude.

The native-bred jacks, who for scores of years battled New England's rigorous Winters and treacherous streams, seem to have vanished, and the large companies in this State, Vermont and Maine are annually forced to import more woodsmen from Canada to insure getting an adequate supply of pulp wood for their mills.

Mr. Davie revealed that the Labor Departments of the three States recently united in a drive to recruit 2,700 woodsmen. Despite the reported widespread unemployment in the larger cities, advertisements inserted in metropolitan newspapers uncovered only a few score men willing to work in the Northern forests.

Pulp cutters are paid $2 to $2.75 a day, plus room and board.

N. Y. U. GRADUATION IS SET FOR JUNE 11

Dr. John C. Merriam of Carnegie Institution Will Give 98th Commencement Address.

SENIOR WEEK IS PLANNED

Schools of University to Give Many Affairs—Chancellor Brown Baccalaureate Speaker.

The ninety-eighth annual commencement address at New York University on Wednesday, June 11, will be delivered by Dr. John Campbell Merriam, president of the Carnegie Institution at Washington, it was announced yesterday by Harold O. Voorhis, secretary at the university. The exercises will be held on the campus at University Heights.

Dr. Merriam holds a doctor's degree from the University of Munich. In 1926 New York University conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws.

Secretary Voorhis said yesterday that the baccalaureate sermon to the seniors would be given next Sunday in the chapel of the Gould Memorial Library on the campus at University Heights by Chancellor Elmer Ellsworth Brown.

Senior week for the largest class in the university's history will commence this week. The School of Commerce, Accounts and Finance degree candidates will hold class night Tuesday in the auditorium of the Judson Memorial Church at Washington Square. The class prophecy, song and poem will be presented at that time.

The final meeting of the class of 1930 in this division of the university will be held at the same place on Thursday evening, when Dean John T. Madden will give his farewell address to the class. The annual dinner will be held at the Hollywood Café on Monday, June 9, which will be followed by a theatre party.

Washington Square College senior week will open June 9 with a women's luncheon and bridge in the afternoon and a men's smoker in the evening. The young women's gathering will be held at the American Woman's Association clubhouse, 361 West Fifty-seventh Street, and the men's affair at Nicolaus's on Second Avenue.

Washington Square College class day is set for Tuesday, June 10. On Thursday, June 12, the class will have its theatre party. A moonlight boat ride and supper Friday evening and the week will close June 14 with a dinner dance in the American Woman's Association clubhouse.

Members of the University Heights student council and Perstare et Praestare, honorary non-athletic society, will give a dinner in the Town Hall Club next Wednesday. The fraternities at the University Heights centre are planning farewell dances on June 7.

Degree candidates in the School of Education will give a dance on the roof of the new School of Education building in West Fourth Street on Monday, June 9. The junior class will give a tea to the seniors and their families after the commencement exercises on the following Wednesday in the Students' Building at Washington Square.

ATLANTIC-PACIFIC TRADE UP

But Total for Month Showed Drop of 262,886 Tons From April, 1929—Big Decline in Nitrates.

Special Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BALBOA, May 29 (by Air Mail).—The decline in cargo passing through the Panama Canal continued in April with 103,456 tons less than in March, and the total for April of 2,456,782 tons was 262,886 tons less than the total for April, 1929. The decrease in the Atlantic-to-Pacific route from April a year ago amounted to 56,331 tons, and it was 206,555 tons from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

The Atlantic-to-Pacific cargo, totaling 896,119 tons, showed an increase of 64,133 tons over March, but the 1,650,663 tons moving from the Pacific to the Atlantic was 165,589 tons less than in March.

The principal decreases in April, 1930, compared to April, 1929, in the Atlantic to Pacific trade were: Automobiles, 9,257 tons; manufactured goods of iron and steel, 59,021 tons, and sugar, 11,385 tons. Increases were shown in ammonia, 5,796 tons; coal and coke, 5,756 tons; cotton, 4,130 tons; scrap metal, 11,363 tons; phosphates, 18,515 tons, and sulphur, 17,105 tons.

Big Decrease in Nitrates.

The heaviest decrease in the Pacific to Atlantic trade was 165,288 tons in nitrates, largely from Chile. Other commodities showing decreases were fresh and dried fruits, 23,021 tons; oats, 6,917 tons; sugar, 38,679 tons, and wheat, 65,377 tons. Increases were shown in lumber, 5,892 tons; mineral oils, 28,826 tons; whale oil, 27,164 tons, and ores, principally iron, 26,572 tons.

In the Atlantic to Pacific trade 65.4 per cent of the cargo transited in April originated on the Eastern and Gulf seaboards of the United States, and 27 per cent in Europe. Tonnage from the United States decreased 29,365 tons, or 5.3 per cent, as compared with April, 1929, although the proportion to the total tonnage was somewhat higher. The amount originating in Europe was 217,650 tons in April, 1930, as compared with 222,966 tons in April, 1929, a decrease of 5,316 tons, or 2.4 per cent, although here again the percentage of the whole was slightly higher.

Classified according to destination, 40 per cent of the Pacific-bound tonnage in April went to the United States, 24.1 per cent to Asia, 17.7 per cent to South America and 12 per cent to Australia.

Cargo tonnage to all these areas, with the exception of Asia, declined, as compared with April, 1929, as follows: To the United States, 45,141 tons, or 12.3 per cent; to South America, 2,615, or 1.8 per cent, and to Australasia, 26,348, or 21.4 per cent. Tonnage to Asia increased 24,265 tons, or 14.3 per cent. In point of the relation of cargo destined to the aforementioned areas to the total tonnage in this direction, that to the United Sates and Ausralasia decreased, while that to Asia and South America showed a gain.

Pacific to Atlantic Figures.

In the Pacific to Atlantic cargo movement in April 48.6 per cent came from the United States, 23 per cent from South America, 13 per cent from Canada, 4.6 per cent from Asia and 9.3 per cent from Australasia. As compared with the corresponding month a year ago, tonnage from the United States decreased 3,332 tons, or 0.4 per cent, though the percentage of the total was somewhat higher.

On account of the greatly reduced nitrate shipments cargo tonnage from South America decreased 182,354 tons, or 32.4 per cent, and also showed a greatly reduced percentage in its relation to the total cargo. Tonnage from Canada and Asia showed decreases in actual tonnage in the amounts of 52,616, or 19.8 per cent, and 17,438, or 18.7 per cent, respectively, as compared with April, 1930, as well as decreases in proportion to the total cargo. On account of heavy whale oil shipments cargo tonnage from Australasia increased 43,285 tons, or 39.3 per cent, also showing a large increase in its proportion to the total Atlantic-bound cargo movement.

Segregated according to destination, 57.6 per cent of the cargo in this direction went to the United States and 34.3 per cent to Europe. Tonnage to the United States increased in its proportion to the total tonnage in this direction over April, 1929, but showed a decrease in actual tonnage of 89,299 tons, or 8.6 per cent. That to Europe showed a decrease in its relation to the total cargo as well as an actual decrease of 135,797 tons, or 19.4 per cent.

CIGAR STUBS TRAIL ROBBER.

Youth Held in Memphis Is "Old Stogie," Spry Burglar, Say Police.

MEMPHIS, Tenn., May 31 (AP).—A robber, nicknamed Old Stogie, because he smoked cigars as he worked and left the stubs scattered on costly carpets in numerous Memphis homes, was believed identified with the arrest and confession here today of James H. Calloway, 24, of New Orleans.

He was found by police in a hotel room and the first thing he did after being arrested, the officers said, was to confess that he robbed the home of Claude J. Tully, wealthy Memphis lumber man, of $1,200 worth of jewels last night.

He also confessed a series of burglaries that had baffled police for weeks, the authorities declared.

Indian Girl, 20, Defies Tribe, Gets Civil Post; Lauded by Interior Department for Her Papers

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 31.—Overcoming the opposition of her tribe, Juanita Crispin, aged 20 years, a full-blood Pueblo Indian girl of New Mexico, has passed a civil service examination for matron and seamstress and will receive a government post at $1,080 a year, the Interior Department announced today.

The girl was born in Santo Domingo Pueblo, between Santa Fe and Albuquerque, a settlement more determined than any of the others, the department said, that it should maintain the aboriginal manner of life. The tribe once blew up a windmill established by the government and has refused to permit its members to use shower baths and laundry tubs with running water which the government provided.

Despite the attitude of her people, the department said, the girl went to an Indian boarding school at Santa Fe and later became housekeeper at a day school, defying the tribe in order to obtain an education.

The girl's examination papers are written in a tiny copper-plate hand that would "do credit to any Vassar graduate," the department said. In them she discussed the care of living quarters, sanitation, diet and the making of clothes.

"Her paper," the department added, "would be a remarkable one to have been produced by a white girl with centuries of civilized living and every home and educational advantage back of her. It demonstrates the possibilities that lie in the aborigine.

"The pay that Juanita will receive from the government will be fabulous from the standpoint of the Indians among whom she grew up. Her success, it is expected, will be a demonstration to the village of the possibilities that lie in following the ways of the white man.

"It may do much toward breaking down the prejudice against going to school. It may even find its way beyond the reservations and furnish inspiration to members of other races who become discouraged with the frequency and difficulty of the hurdles they encounter."

LONG TOUR BOOKINGS SHOWING A DECLINE

Rail and Travel Officials Say Vacationists Are Planning Shorter and Cheaper Trips.

BLAME BUSINESS SLUMP

New York Central, Lehigh Valley and Lackawanna Find Short Haul Traffic Above Transcontinental.

Advance bookings for long vacation tours have fallen off this year as compared with previous years, and many more persons are planning the less expensive trips through the scenic parts of the East, railroad and travel bureau officials said yesterday.

In anticipation of this, one railroad, the Lehigh Valley, has added three short tours of eight, ten and twelve days each to attract those who would have taken longer vacation trips were it not for the general business depression which followed the stock market crash last Fall.

Officials of the New York Central Railroad said that tourist traffic in general had fallen off considerably, and particularly on the transcontinental tours. Short-haul traffic is slightly better, they said, but by no means up to the mark of preceding years.

C. A. Barber, general passenger agent of the Lehigh Valley, said that the belief existed in railroad circles that shorter, less expensive vacation trips would be taken this Summer, and that the advance bookings of his railroad appear to bear out this theory.

The railroad will make up for the loss of the transcontinental traffic by increased traffic on the three new tours, he said.

W. H. Dominick, general passenger agent of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad, said that transcontinental bookings were bearing up fairly well, and with the coming of warmer weather might approach those of last year, but that the bookings for the shorter tours were already far ahead of last year.

Officials of the Pennsylvania Railroad said that thus far they had noticed no decline in the long-haul traffic or any increase in the shorter trips. Raymond & Whitcomb and Thomas Cook & Son, travel agencies, concurred in this.

J. Lehrenkrauss & Son, another travel agency, agreed with the railroad officials that the tendency this Summer would be toward the shorter and less expensive vacation tour.

All agreed that the business depression was responsible for the tendency.

Auburn Fugitive Recaptured.

AUBURN, N. Y., May 31 (AP).—Auburn prison officials were notified today by the Binghamton police that James Wolcott, 20 years old, who escaped from the prison road camp at Niles on March 30, had been arrested and was being held for authorities here. Acting Warden Heacox said a guard would be sent to bring him back to Auburn. Wolcott was serving eight years for attempted first-degree robbery. He was convicted in Tioga County in 1926.

TO DEPICT HISTORY OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Pageant From Oct. 12 to 15 to Mark the 250th Anniversary of Its Settlement.

CHARTER GRANTED IN 1730

Scenes in Drama, Music and Dance Will Assemble Cast of 3,000 to Re-enact Important Events.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., May 31.—Pioneer days in New Brunswick, dating from the meeting of the white man and the red man in 1680, and the granting of a charter to the city by George II in 1730 will be depicted here from Oct. 12 to Oct. 15 as this community celebrates the 250th anniversary of its settlement and the 200th anniversary of the charter. The cast presenting "The Pageant of New Brunswick" will include 3,000 persons, many of them direct descendants of the early settlers.

Twelve "actions," a prologue and an epilogue will make up this "drama on the highway," which will be given on the evenings of Oct. 13 and 14 on Neilson Field, Rutgers University. The historical spectacle, in drama, music and dance, was written by Percy Jewett Burrell of Boston. Dr. William H. S. Demarest, former president of Rutgers University and now president of the New Brunswick Theological Seminary, is chairman of the pageant committee.

Among those invited to attend the celebration are President Herbert Hoover, Governor Morgan F. Larson of New Jersey, Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt of New York, Governor John S. Fisher of Pennsylvania, Sir Ronald Lindsay, Ambassador from Great Britain, and Minister Van Royen of the Netherlands.

Scenes to be depicted in the pageant include the crossing of the Indian trails at New Brunswick, the coming of the Dutch, English and Scotch settlers, the first Common Council meeting in 1730, the building of the churches, the first Rutgers commencement in 1774, when one student, Matthew Leydt, was graduated; the Revolutionary War days, the ball given by the French Ambassador, Baron Paul Hyde de Neuville, in 1815; the sailing of the Forty-Niners for California and the Civil War days.

The twelfth "action" will be the first intercollegiate football game played between Princeton and Rutgers here on Nov. 6, 1869, which will be re-enacted by fifty "bewhiskered" youths. John W. Herbert of New York City, Rutgers graduate in the class of 1872, and a player in that first game, is expected to coach the two teams in the art of football as it was played in the early days.

Record Ship Price for Swordfish.

NEW BEDFORD, Mass., May 31 (AP).—Four swordfish landed here today from the schooner Liberty, Captain Claude Wagner, Edgartown, brought 70 cents a pound, the largest price swordfish ever sold for from the boat, according to the skipper, who for several years had had the record of landing the first swordfish. Captain Wagner reports this is also the earliest date swordfish have ever been landed here. The first swordfish was taken this year on May 17, sixty miles southeast of Nantucket South Shoals lightship.

IOWA PRIMARY EVE SEES RIVALS ABLAZE

Hammill Calls Tariff Bill Child of "Grundy Pirates"—Dickinson Says It Is Hoover's Own.

BOTH SWEAR BY PRESIDENT

And Both Are Backsliders, Declares Lund, Brookhart Man, of Senatorial Opponents.

Special to The New York Times.

DES MOINES, Iowa, May 31.—The tariff, Boulder Dam and blackstrap molasses are ringing issues between Governor John Hammill and Representative L. J. Dickinson in the closing hours of Iowa's Republican Senatorship battle. Both camps declare they are 100 per cent in line with Mr. Hoover, the President being an Iowa native son, and the approach of Monday's primaries finds the two leading rivals loudly asserting that they have excellent standing at the White House.

Arm in arm travels a twin issue, "Who is the farmer's best friend?" Scores of speeches have been delivered on this. Dickinson, twelve years in Congress, introduced the bill that became the basis for the Federal Farm Board act. Hammill, three times Governor back in the days of the corn belt uprising, called the conferences of the corn States which culminated in the battle of Kansas City over the farm relief plank in the Republican National Convention.

"In Step With Hoover."

Hammill, attacking the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill as the product of "the Longworth-Grundy pirate gang," says it is an anti-Hoover tariff. Dickinson advocating the tariff bill, says it is "Hoover's tariff bill, and the President will sign it."

Both, in every speech, are swearing fealty to Hoover and the Republican party. Each insists he is "in step with Hoover" and that his rival is not.

Meanwhile, Frank J. Lund, Senator Brookhart's manager, as a third candidate is assailing Hammill and Dickinson as backsliders on the equalization fee. Lund says the tariff bill is "a betrayal of Hoover to the industrialists."

Radicalism is absent from the main show. The populace does not seem excited, accustomed as it is in Iowa to blood and thunder gladiatorial combats between insurgents and stalwarts. Titles have been plentifully bestowed and the sobriquets of "Honest John" and "Hell raising Dick," are widely heard. Both candidates are of prepossessing appearance. They look like statesmen, and each is possessed of a deep, sonorous voice.

Hammill has the support of a State machine. Dickinson also has powerful champions, among them two former Governors, William L. Harding and N. E. Kendall. Labor has attacked Hammill. Most of the politicians seem to think Dickinson is leading. The Hammill forces say factors operating beneath the surface will put the Governor over.

Interest in Governorship.

All Iowa's representatives in Congress are Republicans and only three have fights at the Monday primaries. In the Fourth District, in Northeast Iowa, Gilbert N. Haugen, thirty-two years in Congress and author of the McNary-Haugen bill, is opposed by State Senator Charles A. Benson and W. M. Strand, but Haugen is not believed to be in danger. In the First Congressional District Representative W. F. Kopp is opposed by Louis J. Kehoe, and in the Third, Representative T. J. B. Robinson is opposed by William Galloway.

More interest is displayed in the Governorship fight. State income tax is the issue. Of the three Republican aspirants, Dan W. Turner of Corning is for it, Ed M. Smith of Winterset and Otto F. Lange of Dubuque are against it.

Smith is Secretary of State, an editor and authority on taxation. Turner is a millionaire farmer-merchant. He was a speaker on the farm relief plank at the battle of Kansas City and is a scrapper—in the Spanish-American War he was welterweight champion of the army in the Philippines. The indications are that Turner is in the lead of Smith. The Democratic candidate is Fred Hageman of Waverly, a lawyer.

SIMMONS FACES TEST.

"Hoovercrat"-Smith Issue Is Drawn in North Carolina Primary.

WASHINGTON, May 31 (AP).—A drama of the old South with a theme that might be called "Shall We Vote in 1930 As We Did in '28?" will attract interest in the State primary elections during the coming week.

North Carolina is the locale. The issue of 1928, with all its possibilities for gauging the future of North Carolina's voting strength, is squarely involved in the struggle for the Democratic nomination for United States Senator.

The primary will be held Saturday, June 7. The result, admittedly, is of singular interest to both major parties. It should afford a basis for appealing to voters of the State in the Presidential election two years hence. Likewise, it is regarded as important in the effort of Republicans to consolidate the gains they made in the State in 1928.

This is the situation:

President Hoover's plurality in North Carolina was 61,227. Democratic Governor O. Max Gardner was elected by 72,594 votes.

This huge apparent defection of Democratic votes was due to the expressed opposition of many Democrats to the views of Alfred E. Smith.

One branch of the Democratic party brands Senator Simmons as having been a leader of the movement, and he is vigorously opposed within his party on that score.

There are two other candidates for the nomination, but the fight is conceded to be between Senator Simmons and Josiah W. Bailey, a Raleigh attorney. Bailey is a former editor of a Church paper and was an outstanding Smith supporter two years ago.

Thomas L. Estep is the third candidate. He is running on a wet platform.

Venezuela to Pay Off Its Debt To Mark 100th Year of Freedom

WASHINGTON, May 31 (AP).—A new way of celebrating a national historic event has just been adopted by Venezuela.

That country, to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the establishment of its independence from Spanish rule, which took place under the leadership of Bolivar, has decided during the year to pay off its entire national debt.

The total sum involved amounts to $4,700,000.

IRONWORKERS' ROW UP HERE TOMORROW

Employers' Group Will Act in Closed Shop Erection Dispute in Progress 25 Years.

GREEN'S RULINGS AT ISSUE

Disputants Fail to Agree on Points Covered by Mediator—Open Shop Leader Sees Strike Danger.

The tentative agreement between the Structural Steel Board of Trade and the International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers will be considered tomorrow at a meeting of the employers' association, it was learned yesterday.

When the agreement is ratified by the employers it will end the twenty-five-year dispute involving the erection of structural steel in this city, as between those employers who have been operating on an opne shop basis and the union, which has been seeking to make New York City a closed shop terirtory.

It had been expected that the Structural Steel Board of Trade would take final action tomorrow, either to ratify the tentative pact, to reject it or send it back for further changes. However, several points in the mediation report of William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, were interpreted differently by the negotiators, Charles L. Eidlitz, chairman of the board of the employers and P. J. Morrin, president of the union.

Mr. Green acted as sole mediator on four points and made his report several weeks ago, but the disputants could not agree on the meaning of some of the rulings.

The agreement, if ratified, will mean that 75 per cent of the 500,000 tons of steel erected annually in New York under the open shop plan will be erected under closed shop rules in addition to the 25 per cent now erected under closed shop terms. The union thus would gain for the closed shop about one-third of the steel tonnage of the country.

According to Noel Sargent, secretary of the open sohp committee of the National Association of Manufacturers, union recognition by the open shop employers would add $20 a ton or $10,000,000 a year to the cost of steel erection in New York City.

"Open shop wages are as high as the union scale, but the increased costs would be caused by union rules and practices," Mr. Sargent said. "A closed shop agreement would also enable the union, with increased prestige and funds, to concentrate attack on open shop steel erecting in other cities.

"The union will demand that all steel erected shall be fabricated in union shops. This will hit both the outside fabricators and the fabricating shops and subsidiaries of the great steel companies.

"Unless some steel firm was willing to sacrifice open shop principle for the sake of obtaining a practical monopoly upon the supply of steel for the closed shop erecting markets we would see a revival of the great steel strike controversy."

MAY SAYS COLD FAREWELL.

Last Day of Month Brings Low Temperatures to New England.

SPRINGFIELD, Mass., May 31 (AP).—Temperatures ranging between 30 and 40 degrees hereabouts last night and early today established a low mark for the final day of May that has not been bettered in some years.

Brimfield, where the lowest reading was obtained, reported a light frost, but without damage to vegetation.

NEW ORLEANS, May 31 (AP).—Today was the "coldest" May 31 in New Orleans since 1889, the official Weather Bureau report said. The low temperature was 60 degrees, as compared with 54 degrees on May 31, 1889.

College and Small Industrial Towns Expand—Seven Cities in This Class Have Fewer People.

WASHINGTON, May 31 (AP).—The decade of the twenties was a period of substantial growth to the mid-sized city.

Associated Press compilations, covering about 800 cities already announced by census supervisors, showed marked increases in cities of 25,000 to 50,000 in most cases.

Especially noticeable was the rise of the sizeable suburb to the great metropolitan centres. This trend continued on down into cities of lesser populations.

The Associated Press listings have been arranged to show comparative ratings with the census of ten years ago, as well as with other cities.

ORANGE COUNTY INCREASES

Census Puts Total at 130,318—Putnam Total Is 13,728.

Special to The New York Times.

GOSHEN, N. Y., May 31.—Census statistics for Putnam and Orange Counties, gathered recently under James Montgomery, Census Supervisor, it was learned today, have disclosed that the population of both counties shows a decided increase in 1930 over the count of ten years ago.

Orange County now has 130,318, an increase of 10,474 since 1920. Nearly half of the increase in the county was made in Middletown, N. Y., and its near-by suburbs.

Putnam's population is put at 13,728, a gain of 2,926 over the count ten years ago. Brewster and Cold Spring villages made substantial gains in Putnam.

PRISON GUARD DISMISSED.

Connecticut Warden Drops Man Questioned in Escape of Trio.

WETHERSFIELD, Conn., May 31 (AP).—Dennis F. Horgan, a guard at the Connecticut State Prison who, in testimony given during an inquiry into the escape Jan. 4 of three convicts, told of a bribe being offered for two hacksaws, has been dismissed.

Warden C. S. Reed said today the action was for "good of the service" and the charge was neglect of duty, Horgan having been found asleep at his post.

The prisoners who escaped were Lalone, Moulthorpe and Landry, now back in prison after an adventure in Florida in which an officer was killed.

CHILD AID SOCIETY TO OPEN PLAYFIELDS

Policy Marks a "New Line of Attack" in Preventing Juvenile Delinqency.

HAS $6,500,000 PROGRAM

Declares Centres Will Cost $10 a Year Per Boy, While Reform in an Institution Will Cost $450.

Within a month the Children's Aid Society, which in 1890 supported twenty-two industrial schools and health centres, enrolling 10,000 children throughout the city, will be conducting only four small classes and will have embarked upon a new and definite program of preventing juvenile delinquency by building playgrounds and boys' and girls' clubs in congested districts.

This radical departure from the former policy of the society was described by Owen R. Lovejoy, its executive director, and William Lewis Butcher, supervisor, as constituting one of the most radical and most important changes the organization has undertaken throughout its long history.

They spoke of the once thriving schools as having "served their day" and of modern metropolitan conditions as demanding a "new line of attack." Whereas a generation or more ago there was an urgent need for class-room seats for the city's underprivileged children, the present day public school system provides the lack which formerly prevailed. Present-day school buildings, they pointed out, provide an elementary education for the city's children, together with a measure of health inspection and malnutrition treatment.

"We do not mean that everything is perfect, but in this field we are unquestionably on the road to being as nearly so as could reasonably be expected," Mr. Butcher said. "Therefore the Children's Aid Society must blaze a new trail.

Gang Spirit to Be Attacked.

"We are planning, in a large and very definite way, what we call the 'spare time approach.' Hundreds of our minors, boys and girls both, are 'playing' their way into trouble. Every boy is gregarious. He does not want to play alone. In him the gang spirit is strong. If left to himself—and home influences are every day growing weaker—he is liable to find expression of this instinct in the street corner and back alley gang, where delinquency breeds.

"It is our purpose to provide, for boy and girl alike, clubs and playgrounds where they may exercise their gregarious play instinct under wholesome conditions. The clubs will not be open one day or night a week, or several. They will be open all the time, not to teach or to lecture, but to guide the children by giving them playgrounds, gymnasiums and swimming pools, club and reading rooms, where they can play heartily. Each centre will have health facilities."

The $6,500,000 program which the society is undertaking was described by Mr. Lovejoy. One of the centres planned is already being developed between 133d and 134th Streets, near Lenox Avenue, in Harlem. A playground 100 feet square has been built. Adjoining buildings will be torn down, and a building for boys and another for girls erected. The entire project will cost $600,000 and $50,000 a year to operate.

Crime Prevention Is Aim.

"Such a centre would cost about $10 per child per year," Mr. Lovejoy said. "The cost of maintaining a boy in a penal institution is about $450 a year. The former is preventive. The latter rarely cures."

A $300,000 boys' club building is to be built at Second Avenue and Fifty-first Street. A centre for boys and girls is already being developed at the Schermerhorn Playground on West Thirty-eighth Street. At Hester and Elizabeth Streets, the old "Italian" school building owned by the society is to be renovated and adjoining it a gymnasium and swimming pool are to be constructed. This will cost $100,000.

Additional playground property has been purchased adjoining the society's Gramercy Boys' Club on East Sixteenth Street, near Avenue B, and eventually a complete centre for boys and girls, by remodeling old buildings, is planned. With the $200,000 awarded the society from the Hubert estate by the Alfred E. Smith, Calvin Coolidge and Julius Rosenwald commission, a large centre below Washington Square on the west side will be started. About $500,000 more is needed for the project.

"These centres are to be where the worst conditions in the city are found," Mr. Lovejoy said, "but investigators have recommended twelve such centres in specific localities. We will go ahead with the plan as fast as we can get the money to do it. The centres should be at least partly endowed."

HOWARD LEADS IN COUNT.

He Is Far Ahead in Partial Tally of Typographical Union's Vote.

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., May 31 (AP).—Tellers compiling an unofficial count in the referendum election of new officers of the International Typographical Union announced tonight that 373 local unions out of a total of about 785 voting have given Charles P. Howard, Indianapolis, the incumbent, 22,529 votes for the presidency. The official count will not be begun until June 7.

The other two presidential candidates ran far behind. Fred Barker, Spokane, Wash., polled 8,879 and R. G. Soderstrom, Streator, Ill., 8,410.

Other contests ran as follows:

For first vice president: Theodore Perry, Indianapolis (incumbent), 28,365; James Simpson, Toronto, Canada, 9,828; M. A. Adler, Boston, 7,040.

For second vice president: George Bentley, New York (incumbent), 23,931; Edward C. Scheu, Milwaukee, Wis., 8,150, and Thomas J. Connelly, Lincoln, Neb., 6,784.

For secretary treasurer: Woodruff Randolph, Chicago (incumbent), 23,209, and John J. Buckley, New York, 13,957.

The unofficial tabulation is expected to be completed Monday. The count this far includes the two largest unions—New York and Chicago.

Latest Guest at Bronx Zoo Comes From Brazil; Hard to Describe, It Resembles Dog and Fox

Near the animal house in the Bronx Park Zoo, a small animal, with brown fur that looks something like the second cousin of a dog, enjoys the distinction and honor that goes with "the latest acquisition." He gazes wistfully at the large crowds and occasionally snarls defiantly to let the passer-by know he is the "only one in captivity."

When Curator Raymond L. Ditmars transferred the canine from a box from South America to a place in the zoo, he shook his head and was at a loss for words to describe him. Although the animal looked like a dog, he was more than a dog, and after inquiries into animal lore, a sign was placed on the cage bearing the words "Cerdocyn Microtis."

An official of the American Museum of Natural History, who is familiar with the names of strange animals, explained that "Cerdocvn" is a compound word of Greek derivation, meaning "fox-dog" and "Microtis" means "small ears."

The animal is found in Brazil in the region of the Amazon River, he said, and while it has the general characteristics of a dog, it has the small ears and slightly bushy tail of a fox. The species is very scarce, he said, and difficult to capture and the specimen at the zoo is the only one in captivity in this country, so far as can be ascertained.

It was brought to this country from Brazil by Ellis Joseph, animal dealer, with a shipment of other Amazon animals.

WOMAN STRANGLED IN BROOKLYN HOME

Body Found Beside Burning Mattress When Firemen Enter the Apartment.

NECK BOUND WITH STOCKING

Widow, 63, Occupied Six Rooms With Aged Uncle and Boarder —$100 Cash Untouched.

Strangled with a silk stocking, Mrs. Rose Blatt, a widow, 63 years old, was found beside a burning mattress in a bedroom of a six-room "railroad" flat on the third floor of a brownstone house at 501 Atlantic Avenue, Brooklyn, at 8:30 last night.

Mrs. Blatt shared the apartment with her uncle, Harry Morrell, 75 years old, a crockery packer for the department store of Frederick Loeser & Co., in Brooklyn, and a boarder, John Ricci, 28 years old, a newsboy. Both told the police that they had been absent from the flat all day.

No weapon was found in the apartment. More than $100 in cash, kept in a small strong box and a small amount of money in Mrs. Blatt's handbag had not been taken.

The crime was discovered when Alfred Wanglund, a gas company employe who had been sent to the house to repair a meter, noticed smoke in the third floor hallway. He called to Edward Hurley, a fellow-workman, who brought Patrolman Thomas Collins to the house and turned in a fire alarm.

When Collins arrived Wanglund had traced the smoke fumes to the Morrell flat. The three men went to the roof and down the fire escape to the kitchen of the home. The door connecting the kitchen with the rest of the apartment was locked. They forced a window and climbed in.

At that moment firemen arrived. They broke open the main door of the Morrell apartment, entering a private hall. Down the hall, from the first bedroom in the line, they saw smoke seeping out under a door. When this door had been forced they found Mrs. Blatt's body on the floor beside the burning mattress. The fire was extinguished and an ambulance was called from the Holy Family Hospital. The ambulance surgeon pronounced Mrs. Blatt dead.

Other tenants in the house said that they had heard no sounds of a struggle. The police took one young man, John Moncaldo, 27 years old, a laborer, who lives on the top floor, to the Bergen Street station for questioning when they examined Morrell and Ricci.

Ricci said that he had left the apartment at noon and had been at his newsstand since that time.

NEW COMET ENTERS OUR HORIZON TODAY

Visible by Telescope in Many Parts of Country, but Soon Will Pass Out of Range.

The comet discovered on May 2 by Drs. Schwassmann and Wachmann of Bergedorf Observatory, Germany, was visible in many parts of this country early today through telescopes, rising to its highest point above the horizon over New York at 3 A. M.

After having reached a point closest to the earth today, the comet will travel toward its perihelion, or point closet to the sun, which, astronomers say, will be reached on June 13. After that it will move rapidly away from the solar system and soon be out of range of the most powerful of telescopes.

The new comet will provide nothing like the celestial display made by Halley's Comet, but it is the nearest thing to a visible comet in many years. Its position, when closest to Earth, is just southeast of the constellation Dolphin, a small group of stars directly south of the Northern Cross and well down toward the horizon.

The two German astronomers have made several important discoveries in recent years. Last February they detected a new comet in the constellation Leo. In 1927 they discovered a new comet and a new star, Nova Orionis.

DOCTORS WILL STUDY MAN BEING EXECUTED

Special Stethoscope Will Record Heart Action of Nevadan in Gas Chamber Monday.

RENO, Nev., May 31 (AP).—Scientific observation of the heart action of R. H. (Bob) White, to be executed in State prison here Monday by the use of hydrocyanic acid gas, is to be made by Dr. E. E. Hamer, State public health officer.

Dr. Hamer today said he had prepared a stethoscope with an extended tube. The instrument will be placed over White's heart and the end of the tube taken outside the gas chamber. The health officer said he would make the test to satisfy inquiries made by medical men seeking information concerning the heart and lung action of previous persons executed.

White, a gambler, was sentenced to death for the murder of an associate. Last night, asked if the warden could do anything for him, the prisoner laughed and said:

"You might get me a gas mask."

MAN AND WOMAN PLEAD NOT GUILTY IN SLAYING

Ohio Pair, Said to Have Confessed Killing His Wife, Are Held for Grand Jury.

JEFFERSON, Ohio, May 31 (AP).—Mrs. Maude Lowther, aged 22, a housemaid, and Trilby Smith, 26, a truck driver, both of Ashtabula, were held today for a special grand jury meeting June 9 on charges of first-degree murder in the slaying of Smith's wife, Thursday night. Both pleaded not guilty on being arraigned today.

Smith and Mrs. Lowther, county officers said, had confessed that they plotted to kill Mrs. Smith so they could continue with their love affair, which started two weeks ago.

Prior to the arraignment, Mrs. Lowther sat in her cell and in a straightforward manner told of her affair with Smith and of the shooting of Mrs. Smith as the latter sat in her husband's automobile with a three-month baby in her arms.

"I loved him, but now I hate him as much as I loved," the young woman said. "I did just what Trilby told me to do. I did the shooting, but he put me up to it."

She said she met Smith at a picture show.

"He asked me to go out with him that evening and I agreed," she said. "We rode in his truck. We met several times after that. He told me his wife nagged him and that he wanted to get rid of her.

"Two nights before the shooting he came to see me and gave me a revolver.

"'Use this,' he said. "I kept the revolver and asked him what night it was to be done. He told me Thursday night."

Mrs. Lowther is a quarter-blood Indian. She has been married twice, but is separated from her husband.

Smith confessed early yesterday, Sheriff Sheldon said, to taking his wife and their two children for a ride in the truck with which he did a cartage business. At a deserted spot in the road, Smith stopped and Mrs. Lowther stepped from behind a clump of bushes and fired.

NEW ORLEANS BANKS FORCE BACK-TAX DUNS

Calling of $635,500 in Loans to City Crowds Taxpayers—Mayor Accuses Governor of 'Trick.'

NEW ORLEANS, May 31 (AP).—Property owners were scurrying today to raise funds to meet taxes delinquent since August, 1928, their action being forced by the calling of loans to the city by the banks.

Branding the calling of loans as "a political trick" of Governor Huey P. Long, Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley vainly appealed to the bankers to stay the call, and failing, issued orders to force payment of the taxes.

"You well know that in many instances you will cause people to lose their homes or will cause investors in real estate, who have been barely able to carry their property thus far, to lose everything they have put into it," said the Mayor in a letter to the bankers.

The banks had loaned the city $635,500 with the delinquent taxes as surety and at a meeting with city officials and the New Orleans Clearing House, the bankers announced that they had been ordered by the State Banking Department to call the loans.

"The banks insist they have to call the 1928 loans because of the pressure brought to bear on them by the Governor," the Mayor said.

"The ring plunges the city into the red and then hides the books," Governor Long retorted in response to the refusal of the City Commission Council to permit the State auditor, on orders of Governor Long, to audit the city books. The council contended that the Governor had no legal right to inspect the city's books.

LIVING WAGE FOR GIRL IN CHICAGO PUT AT $20

Y. W. C. A. States, However, That She Must Live in a Cooperative Dwelling or Club.

CHICAGO, May 31 (AP).—A working girl in Chicago must earn not less than $20 a week to keep in health and dress attractively, the Young Women Christian Association has determined after a survey. Some other cities are less expensive. To subsist on $20 in Chicago, the working girl must live in some cooperative dwelling or club, else her apartment, shared with a roommate, would bring the budget up to $25.

The survey fixed the reasonable living wage of a girl in Los Angeles and Kansas City at $16; at $19 in Atlanta, $20 in Boston and $21 in Philadelphia. Here is the budget planned for the twenty-dollar girl in Chicago.

Fixed expenses—Room rent with two meals in girls' club, $8.25; lunches, $1.30; car fare, $1.20.

Flexible expenses—Laundry and cleaning, 60 cents; clothing, $5; cosmetics, 35 cents; doctor and dentist, 50 cents; church, 20 cents; gifts, 20 cents; education and recreation, 75 cents, and savings, $1.15.

SOCIALISTS APPEAL TO SOVIET WORKERS

Internationale Denounces Bolshevist Linking of It With Counter-Revolution.

PLEADS FOR LABOR UNITY

Statement for Secret Circulation in Russia Calls for Amnesty and Political Freedom.

Speaking in the name of the Socialist parties of practically every country of Europe and of Argentina and the United States in the "New World," with a combined membership of many millions and with hundreds of Parliamentary representatives, the executive committee of the Socialist Internationale, at a meeting held in Berlin May 11-13, addressed the following appeal to the working people of Russia:

"Workes of the Soviet Union:

"We make our appeal to you at a serious moment.

"We are well aware that attempts have been made to persuade you that the Socialist parties of the world are Social Fascists, lackeys of capitalism, and traitors to the working class. But millions of workers, who have been welded together in the hard school of the political and trade union struggle, have overcome the greatest difficulties and created powerful trade union, economic and political class organizations in order to fight with their help for the ideals of Socialism. Could you really believe that these millions of fighting workers do not understand their own interests, and betray themselves? On behalf of these millions of organized workers we make our appeal to you.

Worry Over News From Russia.

"Deep concern for the fate of the Russian revolution weigh up on the Socialist workers of all countries. They hear of the hunger in your towns. They know that your conditions of labor are often more unfavorable than those of the workers in the capitalist countries. They know of the failure of the forcible methods adopted for the collectivization of the peasantry. They hear with horror of the continuation, indeed, of the intensification, of the bloody terror.

"The Socialist International fears that the continuation of this fatal policy could open up a cleft between the two classes on which the Russian revolution is based—the workers and the peasants. If this should happen, if the peasants of the Soviet Union were filled with hatred against the working class and the revolution, then the danger would arise that the embitterment and desperation of the peasantry would be misued by the White counter-revolutionaries for their aims. The horrible danger would arise of a new civil war in the Soviet Union.

"The victory for the White counter-revolution would be an enormous catastrophe, not only for the peoples of the Soviet Union, who would be robbed of the fruits of their great revolution; not only for the working class, whose heroic fight would be devoid of result, but also for the labor movement, for democracy and for peace throughout the world.

"Supported by decades of experience gained in the political strtuggles on the part of the working class of Europe, the Socialist International declares to you, workers of the Soviet Union, that it rests with you to save the Russian revolution, that the means is in your hands to avoid a catastrophe and bring about a peaceful solution of all the great problems of the revolution.

"The Soviet Government pretends to govern in the name of the working class. It lies in your power, workers of the Soviet Union, to compel it to take the necessary steps. Wahtever may be your opinions, whether you are Communists or whether you belong to no political party, you must ally yourselves with the Socialists in order to save the revolution.

Freedom and Amnesty Demanded.

"Above all, the alliance of the workers with the peasants must be re-established. We, too, wish the peasantry to achieve the development of their economic system on cooperative lines. But this must be done in a voluntary manner. There must be an end to forcible collectivization, to any expropriation of the peasantry. Economic freedom and the right to the free disposal of the products of his labor must be restored and guaranteed to the peasant. Only in this way can agriculture be built up again, foodstuffs assured for the towns and the peasant won over as a friend and ally of the worker.

"Freedom, which is as indispensable to the workers and peasants as air and water, must be restored to the peoples of the Soviet Union. Freedom of speech! Freedom of association! Free and secret elections! Let there be an end to the death penalty! No more mass executions! An amnesty for the political prisoners! Let there be an end to the scandal that men and women who lay in the prisons of the Czar as fighters for the freedom of the working class languish today in the prisons of the Ogpu, in the concentration camps and in the places of banishment in Siberia!

"Through the realization of these demands the peoples of the Soviet Union will go forward in a peaceful manner, but conscious of their aim, towards democracy, in order to release on the basis of freedom the creative forces of the masses for the establishment of Socialism.

"The hearts of the Socialist workers of the whole world will be with the workers of the Soviet Union in this fight for the salvation of the Russian Revolution. On their behalf the Socialist International is always prepared to extend a helping hand to the class comrades in the Soviet Union. We shall strike down the hand of international capitalist reaction with all our strength if it attempts to take advantage of your difficulties in the interests of the counter-revolution.

"Workers of the World, Unite! Workers of the Soviet Union, unite with us for the salvation of the Russian revolution and for the fight for democracy and Socialism!"

Self Determination, Not Revolt.

In a resolution on the question of nationalities within the Soviet Union, the Executive of the Socialist International pointed out that, while it recognized the right of self-determination of the various peoples, something evidenced by the presence on the Executive Committee of representatives of the more or less secret Socialist organizations in the Ukraine, Georgia and Armenia, as well as in Russia proper, it was sharply opposed to the efforts of the anti-Soviet "White Guards" to link up the question of national autonomy with a violent revolution against the Soviet Government.

It is expected that copies of the appeal to the Russian workers will be circulated within the Soviet Union by the old underground route and may help counteract the Bolshevist propaganda which represents the Socialist parties of the world as anti-Soviet and as working for the overthrow of the Russian Government in the interest of the bourgeoisie.

Among the two score Executive Committee members attending the Berlin meeting were Raphael Abramovitch and Victor Sukhomlin of Russia, M. Fedenko of the Ukraine and C. Gvardjaldze of Georgia. Emile Vandervelde of Belgium, president of the Socialist International, presided.

'JURY-FIXING SYSTEM' IS CHARGED IN GEORGIA

Indictments of Five After Conviction of City Clerk Are Followed by New Accusation.

ATLANTA, May 31 (AP).—The Fulton County grand jury, which returned indictments charging five persons with jury tampering in the trial of City Clerk Walter Taylor, today had on file a special presentment saying it had found evidence of "an organized system of jury fixing and attempted corruption."

The presentment called upon all jurors in the Taylor trial, in which the City Clerk was convicted on one count of bribery, and upon all citizens, to report to the grand jury any information they might have as to "every approach and every effort which has been made to corrupt and influence any jurors."

Circumstances under which the Taylor verdict of guilty on one count out of eleven submitted to the trial jury was reached "cast suspicion upon the whole procedure," the grand jury asserted.

"This compromise verdict was agreed upon by eleven jurors upon the demand of one juror," the presentment said. "This unusual position assumed by this particular juror, that he would consent to a verdict of guilty on one count only and on condition that he name the count on which a verdict of guilty was to be founded, and the further fact that secrecy was imposed upon the other jurors to the point that this juror's name should not be divulged, cast suspicion on the whole procedure."

Taylor, who has asked for a new trial after being sentenced to twelve months on the chain gang and fined $1,000, announced yesterday that he would resign as City Clerk. He has held office for nineteen years.

STABBED, HURLED INTO BAY

Unidentified Murder Victim Found Near Rockaway Inlet.

The body of an unidentified man, who evidently had been murdered, was found yesterday near Rockaway Inlet in Jamaica Bay. James Anavello, a laborer, saw the body floating about a half mile west of Beach 169th Street, Rockaway Point.

Patrolman George Seiffert discovered stab wounds on both sides of the neck, and an ambulance surgeon from the Rockaway Beach Hospital said the man probably had been stabbed to death, then thrown into the water.

The man, apparently an Italian, was about 40 years old, 5 feet 2 inches in height and had weighed about 140 pounds. He had a bald spot on the top of his head and a long scar on the forehead. The body had been in the water about two weeks.

This scholarship, to be awarded in September, will be given to the most promising member of this year's graduating class and is designed to pay the expenses of further training leading toward a Bachelor of Science degree.

LINN, Mo., May 31 (AP).—A murder charge against Casper Tillman, an alleged moonshiner, growing out of aid he gave Dr. A. J. Bass, retired Columbia (Mo.) dentist, in disposing of the body of William R. Pearman in a $200,000 insurance plot, was dismissed today for lack of evidence.

DRAMA'S STORY TOLD IN YALE COLLECTION

History of the Theatre From 1755 to Present Day Is Depicted in Grieshaber Gift.

FAMOUS NAMES ARE LISTED

Irving, the Booths and Charles Dickens Are Among Those on Old Programs.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., May 31.—An outline of the history of the theatre from 1755 to the present time is embraced in the Grieshaber collection of theatrical items which has just been given to Yale University by Carl F. Grieshaber of New York City.

The collection is valued at many thousands of dollars, and is made up of a number of smaller collections, supplemented by items which were bought at various sales.

J. H. Brown of Malden, Mass., and Peter Gilsey of New York City are some of the names connected with it.

Two of the most recent owners of part of the collection were the actors, Ed Emerson and Al Fostelle. Fostelle, especially, added to it a large amount of material on early minstrelsy and vaudeville.

Although the collection appears to have been through two fires and a flood, most of the items are in remarkably good condition.

Miss Isabel Wilder, curator of the collection, has catalogued thousands of playbills from scrap books, engravings and photographs of actors and actresses, pictures of theatres and scenes from plays, autographs, contracts and accounts which make up the collection.

There are hundreds of English playbills dating between 1750 and 1800. On them appear such names as Garrick, Sheridan, Kitty Clive, the Macklins and Peg Woffington.

One program of a performance at the Theatre Royal in Covent Garden in 1755 contains the names of Sheridan and Mrs. Bellamy in "Cato," and timorously states at the bottom: "As any obstruction in the movements of the machinery will greatly prejudice the performance of the entertainment, it is hoped that no persons will be displeased at their being refused admittance behind the scenes."

Irving, Booth, Terry in "Othello."

The same theatre on another program of that year, for a performance in which the Macklins starred, requested that ladies send their servants to stand in queue at 3 o'clock. Since the performance did not start until 7, it is evident that the servant problem did not exist at that time.

The same program emphatically asserts that "nothing under the full price will be taken during the performance."

Later programs name Charles Dickens, who appeared as author and actor, along with such celebrities as John Tenniel, illustrator of "Alice in Wonderland"; Wilkie Collins and Mark Lemon.

One of the English programs of 1881 contains the name of Arthur Wing Pinero as Roderigo, with Henry Irving playing the part of Othello, in his own theatre. In the same performance Edwin Booth played Iago and Ellen Terry played Desdemona.

The American portion is even larger and more varied. Groups of handbills and programs trace the careers, here and abroad, of the Booths, Jeffersons, Wallacks, Kembles and Barrymores, and the histories of various American theatres.

One of the earliest American programs, from the theatre at Baltimore, bears the name of Lewis Hallam playing Hamlet in 1787. This is one of the earliest productions of "Hamlet" in this country.

Booth Refused Farm Products.

Hallam was an important figure in the early American theatre, coming over from England to open one of the first theatres here. He survived the Revolutionary theatre, where the theatre was little esteemed because most of its people were English, and he is found in another one of the programs for "Miss Tuke's Night," in his John Street Theatre in 1792.

Later Miss Tuke became Mrs. Lewis Hallam, and her husband lived long enough to appear on still another program at the Park Theatre in 1810, where he played opposite Mrs. Poe, the mother of Edgar Allan Poe.

Dozens of interesting incidents centre around the large number of Booth items.

One of the earliest of these is the appearance of the elder Booth in Vicksburg, Miss., in 1839, where the management added to the bottom of the bill: "The public is informed that the managers are compelled to ask current funds for tickets during Mr. Booth's nights." Evidently Booth was not willing to take sugar or hogs in return for his efforts.

Another Booth program marks Edwin's first appearance at the age of 16 with his father. The same bill listed the advertisement of Professor Carling, the fancy glass worker, and at the same performance with Booth they applauded the popular farce "Slasher and Crasher."

Program Carried Society News.

These records carry Booth through famous performances with Tommaso Salvini, Barrett, Irving, Mrs. John Drew and his own celebrated 100th night in "Hamlet." Mrs. John Drew was frequently seen in the Arch Street Theatre in Philadelphia with John Wilkes Booth, slayer of Lincoln.

An interesting Joe Jefferson program from 1873 contains in its supplementary column much interesting gossip. Starting with the cryptic utterance "'Little Nell,' Chestnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia, Nov. 3, two weeks," it adds that "Sardou is reported to have no less than five plays in the process of construction," and finally comes to the serious news that "A daughter of Mr. and Mrs. August Belmont is to make her début in society next Winter at a grand ball to be given at the residence of the Belmont family."

Col. Roosevelt at Malone to Fish.

MALONE, N. Y., May 31 (AP).—Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, Governor of Porto Rico, has arrived here for a three-day fishing trip. The Colonel reached here last night, accompanied by three friends, to spend the next few days fishing the Salmon River, a brown-trout stream.

PARDON PLEA REVEALS 'ENOCH ARDEN' STORY

Nebraska Prisoner's Canadian Wife, Believing Him Dead, Has Married Again.

OWEN SOUND, Ont., May 31.—A plea for pardon sent to the Nebraska Pardon Board in a Lincoln (Neb.) prison by Lafayette (Harry) Dales, 70, formerly of Owen Sound, has revealed a situation here into which Dales would come as another Enoch Arden should he return to Owen Sound, according to a dispatch to The Toronto Star.

Dales is serving a life sentence for the murder of a horse trader twenty-five years ago when the trader was taking Dales and his wife across the prairies in his wagon. His wife later died, but before the murder, and while she was still living, Dales had married Elize Watterton of Owen Sound. He abandoned her and she was left here with three children, one a baby of 9 months.

Thinking Dales dead, his Owen Sound wife married ten years after his disappearance. She is living here now with her husband, Henry Rourick.

"My children are grown up now. But they and my wife want me, and I want to go back to them," Dales is said to have written the Pardon Board in Nebraska. But Mrs. Rourick, gray haired and 70, declared, according to The Toronto Star dispatch:

"Harry Dales died twenty-seven years ago. His clothes and a tintype photograph were laid on my doorstep one night, and I have not heard anything of him since then. Ten years later I married again. No, it must not be opened again. Harry Dales is dead."

DAUGHTER OF E. W. COX WED SECRETLY A YEAR

Marriage to Simonetty, Fordham Football Star, Revealed by Annulment Suit.

An action to annul the marriage of Valentine Simonetty, 25 years old, former Fordham University baseball and football player, to Muriel Cox, daughter of County Clerk Edward W. Cox of Queens, a year ago in Greenwich, Conn., when the bride was not of legal age, was revealed yesterday when the young man admitted that papers had been served on him which would bring the case into Queens Supreme Court tomorrow.

Simonetty at his parents' home at 2,259 Spuyten Duyvil Road, Riverdale, said he had met Miss Cox at a college dance three years before their marriage. After the marriage, which was performed last June 23 by a Justice of the Peace, he said he saw his bride at her parents' home in Maspeth several nights a week, but then "Mr. and Mrs. Cox turned against me." He last saw his wife on March 23, he said.

Simonetty said he would contest the action and that Bertram Boardman of 291 Broadway would represent him as counsel. He admitted that the marriage had been secret.

Stanley Fowler, attorney for Mr. Cox, said at his home in Brightwaters, L. I., yesterday that Simonetty "misled Muriel into marrying him and she later asked her father for his help and she is not being kept from him against her will."

WEIGH PLAN TO FORM SCHOOL SOCIAL CLINIC

Budget Group of System Studies This Week Ryan Proposal to Aid "Problem" Pupils.

TO MAP OUTLAYS FOR 1931

Summer Evening High School Project, Once Defeated, Will Come Up Again.

MORE TEACHERS SOUGHT

Proportion of Students in Night Classes to Instructors Is Now Considered Too High.

Work on the 1931 budget estimate for the school system will begin this week, when a committee of educators, city officials and accountants will hold the first of a series of sessions devoted to an examination of the educational needs of New York for the coming year.

Next to the debt service the city's 900 schools and their 35,000 teachers, supervisors and officials form the largest item in the municipal budget. The 1930 budget allocated 30.5 per cent of its total for debt service charges, 16.88 per cent for the school system, 14.745 per cent for "protection of life and property" (police and fire departments) and 11.21 per cent for health and sanitation.

Every Summer the divisions of the school system present their needs for the succeeding year to the budget committee. Every year demands for new services, extension of old services and provisions for the expected growth of the system are compromised or denied. Before the committee, whose meetings are attended by Superintendent William J. O'Shea for the professional staff and Arthur S. Somers, finance chairman of the policy-forming Board of Education, files a long line of heads of school divisions, pressing their needs and justifying their tentative departmental estimates.

Bulk of Expenditures.

The first problem facing the committee is, of course, that of providing for the day elementary and secondary schools, which take the bulk of the system's expenditures. That, however, involves little controversy or disagreement. The money is granted as a matter of course and opposition develops only when attempts are made to reduce substantially the pupil-teacher proportion, which involves provision for a large increase in their number.

This year, after the committee goes over the estimates for which merely formal approval is needed, it will be faced with a demand of George J. Ryan, president of the Board of Education, that comprehensive methods be established for dealing with the so-called "problem child," the maladjusted, backward, retarded, unsocial, economically or socially handicapped pupil. Mr. Ryan specifically suggested the creation of behavior and psychological guidance clinics where individual cases of the unadjusted children might be studied. He urged the appointment of social investigators to study the environment, conditions and family circumstances of the child who presents a "problem" to the teachers and to seek solutions which might restore these pupils to the ranks of the normal pupils.

Somewhat similar work is done now by the group of visiting teachers, but there are only twenty-three of them in the entire system, although the post was first created a quarter of a century ago.

The Retardation Problem.

Closely linked with this problem is that of retardation, which has been studied by a school committee for nearly a year and its report is due soon. Figures on retardation are regarded as misleading because they are based on standards which are entirely relative, but educators are concerned by the large number of pupils who fail to "make the grade" in the schools.

Mr. Ryan's plea for a constructive solution of the "problem child" difficulties was supported by an analysis which linked truancy, delinquency and crime. Delinquency and crime students have been turning more and more for aid to the school, and when Mr. Ryan declared that "we are the agency charged" with the adjustment of the problem child, he outlined a general school policy whose details will have to be filled in by the budget estimators.

Another education requirement to be considered by the committee is that of the increase of ungraded classes. There are now 436 such groups in the system.

The proposal for the establishment of a Summer evening high school, disapproved last year, will again be placed before the committee. In connection with this proposal last Summer, Mr. Somers suggested that a study be made of the desirability of altering general school organization to make all-year-around education possible, but several teachers' organizations, including the semi-official Teachers' Council, have reported adversely to the plan and it is unlikely that the project will be brought up again. There are now nine day secondary schools functioning during the vacation months, but evening high school students are not provided for in the Summer program.

Also in connection with the needs of the evening students, the annual plea to provide more teachers in the night schools will be repeated. The average attendance of twenty-eight and thirty for each teacher, respectively for the high and elementary evening schools, is considered too high. The complaint is frequently heard in school circles that the evening schools have been treated as a "stepchild" by the Board of Education and that adequate provision must be made for them if public adult education is to advance.

Demands to Be Renewed.

Last Fall the Board of Estimate made cuts amounting to $210,426 in the budget estimate of the school officials. The items which were reduced will probably reappear again in the 1931 estimates. The financial cuts involved reduction in the number of sight conservation teachers, open-air classes, teachers-in-training, substitutes for absent attendance officers, vocational and non-vocational women teachers, additional Summer playgrounds, substitute teacher clerks and cooking and physical training teachers.

The school budget for this year is $136,600,364.50. The major part of that sum is covered by the general school fund schedule, which calls for an outlay of about $111,500,000, an increase of more than $5,500,000 over 1929. The general fund includes payments of all salaries of the teaching and supervising and attendance officers. The special school fund provides for other miscellaneous payments and amounts this year to more than $19,500,000.

The upkeep and growth of the school system involves, however, additional expenses. The new schools are built by means of bond issues, and the city is spending more than $35,000,000 this year to cover school debt service, retirement system and water, gas and electricity expenses.

GIRL WHO GAVE LIFE WINS VAIL MEDAL

Posthumous Award Made to Phone Operator for Valor in Cleveland Hospital Tragedy.

NINE ON YEAR'S HONOR ROLL

Superintendent Gets Decoration in Same Disaster—Others Gave Flood Warnings.

The valor with which employes of the Bell Telephone System have risen to meet emergencies disturbing the prosaic round of their business duties was disclosed yesterday with the announcement of the 1929 national awards of the Theodore N. Vail medals.

The medals are awarded annually by the Vail Memorial Fund established as a memorial to the former president of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company for acts or services conspicuously illustrating Mr. Vail's ideals in public service.

Plugging into her switchboard to save the lives of others even while deadly fumes were fatally overcoming her, Miss Gladys I. Gibson, telephone operator at the Cleveland clinic, Cleveland, Ohio, won a place at the head of the honor roll of nine men and women. The award of a gold medal goes to her posthumously.

Four Other Cleveland Heroes.

Four other employes of the Ohio Bell Telephone Company who rendered heroic service in the same Cleveland clinic disaster in which Miss Gibson met her death are also on the roll. Gerald T. Mahaffey, district traffic superintendent of the Ohio company, receives the only other gold medal presented besides that given to Miss Gibson. With his medal goes a cash award of $500.

Silver medals with cash awards of $250 in each case go to the following:

JAMES J. ROONAN, district installation foreman, The Ohio Bell Telephone Company, Cleveland.
BENJAMIN G. SPAETH, district plant superintendent, The Ohio Bell Telephone Company, Cleveland.
WALTON A. TURNER JR., district outside maintenance foreman, The Ohio Bell Telephone Company, Cleveland (posthumous award.)
Miss IOLA D. GIBBONS, night chief operator, New Jersey Bell Telephone Company, Woodbridge, N. J.
EPHRAIM W. DECKER, repairman, New York Telephone Company, Rosebank, S. I.
Miss VIVIAN HARPER, operator, Elba Telephone Company, Elba, Ala.
Mrs. MYRTLE DOROTHY DULL, agency chief operator, Southwestern Bell Telephone Company, Elmdale, Kan.

On the day of the clinic disaster—May 15, 1929—Miss Gibson was on duty at her switchboard. At 11:25 A. M. fire started in the basement and at 11:32 there was the first of a series of explosions which spread a gas through the building. Two minutes after the first explosion at the Garfield exchange of the telephone company an operator heard a voice crying: "There's a fire at the clinic—a terible explosion—call the fire department, the police, ambulances—it's awful—and"—

Choking and gasping for breath, the voice, afterward identified as that of Miss Gibson, ceased abruptly. Her words, uttered while she was struggling for consciousness against the fumes, was the primary step in preventing the death toll from being even higher.

The opportunity for escape had been open to Miss Gibson. The switchboard was on the second floor of the building and stood near a window with a ledge, outside which the operator might have reached had she deserted her board. The condition of the switchboard was mute evidence that her first thought was of assistance for others. Indicating that she had tried to spread an alarm, many cords were found plugged into the board.

Accounts of how she was taken from the building vary, but the generally accepted verdict is that firemen found her still seated before her switchboard. It is known definitely that when an attempt was made to revive her in the yard she was still wearing her telephone operator's headset.

Helped Save Victims.

Mr. Mahaffey, the other gold medal winner, rushed to the clinic disaster with G. B. Spaeth, the district plant superintendent, arriving there fifteen minutes after the first explosion. With a handkerchief as an improvised gas mask, Mr. Mahaffey assisted firemen in carrying victims to safety through the fire and gas laden air. Then he manned the switchboard which had been Miss Gibson's and operated it for nearly an hour, answering frantic inquiries and finding out where were the best facilities for the injured. He shouted down his information to the rescue squads on the lawn. He also performed signal service in directing telephone aid and arranging for the compilation of the lists of the dead and injured. He worked until 11 o'clock at night when he collapsed. For some time after the disaster his physical condition was impaired, but he is now apparently in normal health.

The other telephone workers in the disaster helped in rescuing victims and established emergency telephone stations, carrying on their labors through the day and night. Mr. Turner died on Feb. 22, 1930, but his death was in no way attributed to the disaster.

Warned Towns of Flood.

Miss Vivian Harper of Elba, Ala., won a silver medal for her courage on March 14, 1929, when the town of Elba was completely flooded by a ten foot rise of water in two hours. Disregarding personal danger she sent warnings throughout the town and to the neighboring town of Geneva which was in the path of the flood and directed rescue work till every telephone failed. The central office building subsequently collapsed.

Mr. Decker of the New York Telephone Company, on Jan. 26, 1929, while on duty at Rosebank, Staten Island, risked his life in pulling a boy off the third rail of the tracks of an electric railway, near where he was at work. Although the boy, severely burned, had ceased breathing, Mr. Decker started artificial respiration and revived him. The New York Telephone Company also receives a bronze plaque for his work.

Miss Gibbons, on May 6, 1929, despite an explosion in an adjoining building, which seriously rocked the Woodbridge (N. J.) central office, throwing her to the floor with injury to her face and scalp, notified the authorities of the disaster and remained at her post until a police officer forced her to leave the burning building.

Mrs. Dull of Elmdale, Kan., on July 11, 1929, gave warnings of a flood which was endangering her own office. By notifying railroad officials she probably averted the wreck of a passenger train. She elevated her switchboard on boxes and continued on duty as the water rose.

Of fifty-five bronze medals awarded during the year one went to Clarence A. Missel, lineman, of Grand Island, N. Y., employed by the New York Telephone Company. He rescued a fellow-employe from a high-voltage wire.

CORNELL GETS COLLECTION.

Earliest Glass Said to Be Included Among Babylonian Relics.

Special to The New York Times.

ITHACA, N. Y., May 31.—A collection of antiquities obtained in the Near East, some of them dating from 4000 B. C., has been presented to Cornell University by John Randolph, '03, of Greenville, R. I.

The collection contains notably a broken seal of translucent material which resembles artificial glass and, in the opinion of experts, may be the earliest specimen of manufactured glass. According to Professor Nathaniel Schmidt of the Department of Semitic Languages and Oriental History, most of the twenty-six objects are of the same origin as the Babylonian tablets presented last year by Henry Patten of Chicago.

They were brought from the Orient by Mr. Randolph.

CITY COLLEGE SETS SUMMER OPENING

Record Enrolment Expected for Session of 8 Weeks Which Opens June 26.

77 NEW SUBJECTS LISTED

New Commerce Building to Be Used—Business School to Expand for Day and Evening Students.

A record enrolment of more than 7,000 students is expected in the fourteenth annual Summer session of the College of the City of New York, which will commence June 26 and extend for a period of eight weeks, according to an announcement made yesterday by President Frederick B. Robinson. Formal registration opens tomorrow night at 7 P. M. for matriculated students of the evening session.

The curriculum will comprise 370 separate sections in 248 different courses. Of these, seventy-seven are new, thirty-four are organized in what is known as the Linguistic Institute, nineteen in the school of business and twenty-four in various fields of special study.

The new building of the Commerce Centre will be utilized for the first time in the coming Summer session. Provision is being made for the expansion of the business courses. This centre, as well as the buildings on Washington Heights and Willoughby and Pearl Streets, will have both day and evening sessions. Among the new courses to be given are contemporary movements in education, clay modeling and sculpture for teachers, special problems in elementary school teaching, statistics, principles of credit, investments, advertising, transportation, business seminar and business mathematics. Most of these new courses are scheduled for the evening. The educational and psychological clinic will be kept open throughout the Summer.

The Linguistic Institute, comprising thirty-four courses, will convene from July 7 through Aug. 15. Its faculty will consist of twenty-three professors from the leading universities of Europe and the United States. Edgar Howard Sturtevant, Professor of Linguistics at Yale University, will act as its director. President Robinson said yesterday of the institute: "There are in New York thousands of teachers of ancient and modern languages who will welcome the opportunity to study under the outstanding masters of the linguistic science. We believe that the institute will meet a decided need and give an added impetus to the scientific study of languages."

The Summer session of the City College was organized in 1917 by Dr. Robinson, then dean of the school of business, on an eight-week basis, which was a unique departure from the ordinary six-week program. As the reason for his choice, Dr. Robinson said yesterday: "The eight-week program is a logical one because the period is just half the regular semester of sixteen weeks, and consequently the regular number of recitations per week is doubled."

The complete faculty of 165 was announced yesterday by Professor G. Payn Quackenbos, who will direct the session. Among the visiting educators are Professors James W. Park and Ernest N. Henderson of Adelphi and Professor Arthur J. Weston of Stevens Institute.

Balloting for the alumni selections is being conducted through the mails now, President Hetzel said, all three of the members whose terms expire in June having been renominated.

They are James G. White, '82, New York; Boyd A. Musser, '94, Scranton; and William L. Affelder, '99, Pittsburgh.

COLUMBIA TO TEACH MUSIC TO BABIES

Rattles, Bells and Drums Will Be Used in Developing Creative Ability.

SCOPE OF SCHOOL WIDENED

Older Children to Be Instructed at Summer Classes in Rhythm, Choral Singing and Piano.

An opportunity to reveal their musical talent will be given children not yet old enough to enter school in experimental music classes this Summer at Teachers College, Columbia University, Peter W. Dykema, Professor of Music Education at the college, announced yesterday. Classes are to begin on July 7, with the opening of the regular Summer session, and close on Aug. 15.

This will be the third year of the classes, which offer without tuition charges an extensive program of music education to elementary and high school pupils. Their scope has been widened, Professor Dykema said, to include children in the upper grades of high school, as well as babies of pre-kindergarten age.

The small children will get instruction so as to bring out their talents if they show creative ability, and to ground them in musical appreciation if they have not. Songs will be sung to them and they will be taught to produce music with toy instruments, rattles, bells, drums and triangles.

For the older children there will be advanced classes in rhythm, choral singing, song singing, reading of music, class lessons in piano and in orchestral and band instruments, appreciative listening to music, orchestra and band ensemble, making instruments and creative music to play on them. Music history will be studied and there will be special training in chamber music, and string, brass and wood quartets.

Talent to Be Encouraged.

Children with creative talent will be encouraged to compose for the piano, clarinet, trombone and violin. Young virtuosi will have opportunities for individual performances at regular school assemblies and they will also be taught to take their places in group performances.

A feature of the program is the stress to be made on rhythmic expression to music along the lines followed by Isadora Duncan and her disciples. An instructor will play the piano and the children, dressed in gauzy colored costumes, will respond to the music by appropriate movements of the body.

The youngsters will be encouraged to express themselves freely and instinctively, but there will also be instruction in controlled expression. Every note of the music will have its particular accompaniment from the arms and legs and the children will learn to respond to the structure as well as the spirit of the music.

Emotions to Be Trained.

Professor Dykema believes the public schools place too much stress on mental development and leave almost untouched the emotional life of the children. The education of the future, he said, must devote much more time to cultivation of the arts and the experimental classes at Teachers College are intended to point out the most fruitful methods for teaching music to children.

"Our intention is to supply the child with the advantages of a musical father and mother," he explained. "The child who cannot sing usually comes from homes where the parents cannot sing and do not understand or appreciate music. A widespread program along the lines being followed in these special classes would greatly reduce the number of unmusical children who are coming up from the lower grades of our public schools.

"This year we will take for applicants any child who can walk. Our plan is to give the musical child a chance to blossom and the fact that these children appreciate the opportunity has been amply proven by the radiant joy of the youngsters who attended classes last year and the year before.

Tastes to Be Developed.

"Too often our city school children are repressed in their instinctive groping toward musical expression by inadequate school programs. Their brains are developed, but they are given nothing for developing their tastes, nothing to bring them comfort and artistic relaxation in the leisure hours of their adult life. They accept the work given them here as a chance to play. It is not school at all, but a joyous vacation."

Applications from parents have been flooding the music department at the college for the last month. Several examinations, the second of which was held yesterday afternoon, are being used to reduce the number of applicants to 200, which is all the department can handle.

Two other examinations are scheduled as follows: July 3 at 10 A. M. and 2 P. M. in the Lincoln School of Teachers College; July 5 at 10 A. M. in the Lincoln School.

During the Summer classes there will also be examinations to measure the musical ability of the children. Parents will be informed if their children show sufficient promise to warrant their specializing in music.

CINCINNATI UNIVERSITY TO SEEK $8,000,000

Graduate Dean Explains Plan to Build a Great Centre of Scholarship.

Special to The New York Times.

CINCINNATI, May 31.—"To make the University of Cincinnati and the city one of the great centres of thought of this country and perhaps of the world," is what the graduate school of the university aims to accomplish.

Plans for future development were explained by Dean Louis T. More before the Cincinnatus Association.

He said it was his hope and that of others interested in the school that it would be the means of enabling the university and the city to provide a place and means for the training and research work of mature scholars in the humanities.

Dr. More had been requested to tell the association about the recent gifts of Mrs. Charles P. Taft and James M. Hutton and how they would help the university and the graduate school.

Dr. More estimated that it would require about $8,000,000 to assure the realization of his plans for the graduate school, and that he had been promised help in raising that sum and believed it would be raised.

He said that about $2,000,000 would be needed for a building and the income from the rest would be used to bring scholars to the school, to provide them with books, facilities for seclusion and research here and abroad.

MARY HURST WEDS REV. J. WILLIAMS JR.

Church Wedding at Fairmont, W. Va., for New Yorker and His Bride.

A CANDLE-LIGHT CEREMONY

Bride Has Seven Attendants—Reception Is Held at the Fairmont Country Club.

Miss Mary Moulds Hurst, daughter of Mrs. William James Wiegel of Fairmont, W. Va., was married in Christ Church there yesterday afternoon to the Rev. John Williams Jr., son of Mrs. John Williams and the late Rev. Mr. Williams of this city. The Rev. Robert S. Lambert, the rector, performed the ceremony. Garden flowers in shades of blue and yellow decorated the church, which was lighted by candles.

While the guests were assembling there was a program of organ music by Miss Elizabeth Armstrong.

The bride was given in marriage by her stepfather, Mr. Wiegel. She wore a princess gown of ivory-colored satin combined with point lace, and a veil of the same lace over another of tulle. The veils were fastened to the coiffure with orange blossoms. She carried a prayer book with a marker of lilies of the valley.

Miss Mildred Robinson of Fairmont was maid of honor. She wore a costume of green silk net with a sash of a darker shade of green taffeta, and a green horsehair hat. Her bouquet was of yellow rosebuds, tied with green tulle. The Misses Margaret R. W. Johnson, Amelia Bennett, Martha Dickerson and Martha Haywood were bridesmaids. Two of them wore gowns of blue silk net, and the others wore green silk net. The hats corresponded in color with the gowns. All four carried bouquets of garden flowers in shades of blue and green.

Betty Stoetzer and Sally Cranmer, the latter a cousin of the bride, were flower girls. They wore frocks of yellow embroidered voile and carried baskets of yellow rose petals.

Winslow Little of this city was best man for his cousin, and the Rev. Edward M. Mize of Salina, Kan.; the Rev. Richard P. Pressey of Grantwood, N. J.; Alan B. Gilmour of Brooklyn and Harry H. Owen of New Haven, Conn., were ushers.

After the ceremony there was a reception at the Fairmont Country Club.

The wedding trip will be to Canada by motor. The couple will reside at 137 East Sixty-sixth Street, this city.

The Rev. Mr. Williams will have charge of the Church of the Ascension, Fifth Avenue and Tenth Street, this Summer, during the absence of the rector and afterward will be assistant rector. He was graduated last week from the General Theological Seminary in this city and ordained by Bishop Ernest M. Stires in the Cathedral of the Incarnation, Garden City, L. I., on May 25. He is a grandson of the late Joseph J. Little, founder of the Little & Ives Printing Company.

TO MARK MAGNA CARTA DAY.

International Association Plans Observance for June 15.

Plans are under way for the celebration on June 15 of Magna Carta Day, which falls on a Sunday this year, according to word received here yesterday from the International Magna Carta Day Association of St. Paul, Minn. The day will commemorate the signing at Runnymede on June 15, 1215, by King John of the "foundation of English and American liberties."

Religious observances, meetings and other gatherings will be held throughout the United States and the British Empire, the association declared. J. W. Hamilton, founder and secretary of the body, writes that "there is no other day like it."

"Without being a pacifist," continues Mr. Hamilton, "it makes for peace through amity; it is non-sectarian, yet it has its religious aspect; making for good citizenship, it eschews politics. Observance of the day is an American idea, backed by American citizens and now, after a quarter of a century, accepted in every land where English is spoken."

Former President Coolidge is an honorary president of the group.

Landlords and Tenants to Meet.

The recently-organized Harlem Housing Association will hold a mass meeting for landlords and tenants next Thursday evening at P. S. 136, Edgecombe Avenue and East 136th Street, according to an announcement yesterday by Peter P. Cappel, a member of the Mayor's housing committee. The association was formed to promote mutual understanding between tenants and landlords. Tenement House Commissioner William F. Deegan, Health Commissioner Shirley W. Wynne, Sanitation Commissioner William Schroeder Jr., Commissioner of Plant and Structures Albert Goldman, and Markets Commissioner Thomas F. Dwyer will be among the speakers.

Auto Club Favors Pedestrian Control; Canvass Also Suggests Curb on Taxicabs

Queried on whether they favored pedestrian control and to what extent, 66 per cent of the members of the New York Automobile Club, a unit of the American Automobile Association, declared themselves in favor of strict regulation, 27 per cent in favor of modified control limited to certain intersections, and 7 per cent against any form of control, club officials announced yesterday.

The number of those who voted was not given. J. R. Crossley, general manager, said that the questionnaire brought many suggestions for improvement of traffic. Many criticized taxicab drivers for a "general lack of regard for the rights of pedestrians and other motorists," and others complained against the cruising taxicab's slow speed and sudden stops, as well as the practice of stopping away from the curb to accept or discharge passengers. Some urged closer supervision of taxicabs with a definite limit of their number. Other suggestions offered were:

Adoption at all main thoroughfares of the "boulevard stop system," now in force in many cities, which would require all cars to come to a dead stop on a side street before turning into a main highway.

No left turns and no complete turns between Thirty-fourth Street and Fifty-ninth Street, particularly on Fifth Avenue and Broadway.

Adoption of a system, such as now is in use at various street intersections, where a lane be reserved at the extreme right for cars intending to make a right-hand turn, and that all cars entering this lane be compelled to turn.

Prohibition of parking on all streets where there are trolley cars, particularly on narrow streets, such as lower Broadway, the restriction of parking on only one side of one-way streets and the prohibition of trucks parking at right angles to the curb when delivering merchandise.

Mr. Crossley said that after analysis and tabulation of the answers to the questionnaire a report would be submitted to the Police Department, with the club's recommendations.

AMERICAN PHYSICIANS START TOUR OF FRANCE

Group First Visits Deauville—Sturgis Pays Tribute to Famous French Doctors.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, May 31.—A tribute to the great scientific and medical pioneers of France was paid today by Dr. Cyrus C. Sturgis of the University of Michigan, who is heading the group of nearly 100 American and Canadian physicians who began their tour of French watering places with a visit to the fashionable Normandy coast resort of Deauville.

"Not only do we receive great inspiration from your present day physicians and surgeons," said Dr. Sturgis, replying to the address of welcome from Mayor Colas, "but we honor your great masters of medicine who laid down some of the most important of the foundations on which our profession is based.

"We appreciate deeply the work of Lavoisier, Claude Bernard, Pasteur, Laennec, Charcot and many others. Our visit to the country of their birth and where their work was accomplished affords us an opportunity to pay homage to their names."

The party, after landing at Havre yesterday, reached Deauville this morning and was received by local officials, a delegation of French medical men and representatives of the National Touring Bureau.

The Mayor piloted the visitors along the boardwalk to the show places of the town, explaining that while Deauville was not strictly a water cure centre, it was an excellent recuperative resort for the tired business man.

He said that after having seen Deauville's Casino, the place and other attractions, the party would later have ample opportunity, at the other resorts to be visited, of seeing purely medical curative methods.

At the Bar du Soleil the doctors were invited to take champagne, and the names of President Hoover and King George were solemnly pledged.

REPORTS GAIN IN MOVE FOR OLD AGE SECURITY

Association Says Appeals for Aid in Cause Are Coming From All Over Country.

Since the enactment of the old-age pension law in New York State appeals for help to organize committees, conferences and associations to further the cause of old-age insurance have been received by the American Association for Old Age Security "from Portland, Me., to Portland, Ore., and across the continent to the Southeast," according to The Age Security Herald, organ of the association, issued yesterday.

"Despite the fact that the legislation season is over and the Summer lull in other fields has begun to set in, there is greater demand than ever for the launching of local, city and State organizations," it was said. "The life of the movement for social protection of the aged poor of America has been considerably quickened and intensified."

During May permanent old-age security conferences were organized in Connecticut, Michigan, Cleveland, Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. The Herald pointed out that the Massachusetts Legislature had passed a pension measure for the relief of persons over the age of 70 and that the proposal was awaiting the signature of the Governor. A pension measure has also been introduced in the Louisiana Legislature and pension appropriations have been requested in a resolution now before the Baltimore Board of Estimate.

Newburgh Officials Consider Gift of Stewart Property.

Special to The New York Times.

GOSHEN, N. Y., May 31.—The Stewart Grounds on Cochecton Turnpike, Newburgh, have been offered to Newburgh City officials to be used as an airport, with a stipulation in the deed that the field must be sufficiently improved and equipped within five years to permit an airplane to take off there.

FEW CHANGES IN BAND REPORTED BY GOLDMAN

Personnel to Be Almost Same as for Past Five Years When Concerts Begin June 15.

When the Goldman Band opens its thirteenth concert season on June 15 on the Mall in Central Park it will have almost the same personnel it has had for the past five years, Edwin Franko Goldman, director, declared yesterday.

"Among the new members in the band," said Mr. Goldman, "will be a first flutist, John Weston Bell, who will replace Mr. Gaskins, who is now in Europe with the Philharmonic Orchestra; two new cornetists, Oscar Short and George M. Fee; Robert D. McLean, clarinetist, who was formerly with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Edmund G. Wall, clarinetist, formerly soloist with the Sousa Band; Wayne Lewis, euphonium player, and Frank R. Kutak, a drummer. August Helmecke, who had been a member of the band for eleven years until 1927, has been re-engaged as bass drummer."

An E flat clarinet, an extra trombone and saxophone will be added to the instrumentation, the conductor said.

"The personnel of the band," continued Mr. Goldman, "includes wind instrument players from nearly all nations, including Germany, Italy, Russia, Austria, Spain, Belgium, Holland and America."

Referring to compliments often paid to the band for its punctuality in starting its programs, Mr. Goldman said that steady punctuality did not irk the artists and that members of a band must have the trait of precision.

Another characteristic of Mr. Goldman's conducting is shown in the fact that he never refers to a selection to be played by name when addressing the band—the pieces are always referred to by number. This, according to Mr. Goldman, avoids the possible necessity of interpreting to the members of the band who speak foreign tongues.

CHILD MISSES MOTHER, SAILS ON LINER ALONE

Girl, 6, Becomes Separated From Parent While on Shopping Trip With Uncle.

When the Rede Star liner Belgenland left at 11:30 o'clock yesterday morning for Antwerp with 1,000 passengers, she separated a 6-year-old girl from her mother who was left hysterically weeping on the pier.

Mrs. Andree R. Ffelaere, arrived from Pawtucket, R. I., with her daughter Florence and two relatives, just before 8 o'clock and went on board the Belgenland.

After breakfast the relatives, an uncle and aunt, expressed a wish to buy the child some clothes for the trip and all four went up Fourteenth Street to the stores on Sixth Avenue. While the women were inside the uncle walked up and down with his little niece, looking at the windows. Becoming tired of waiting, he hired a taxicab and returned to the Belgenland's pier at the foot of West Sixteenth Street.

He waited until a few minutes before the sailing hour and then went to look for his wife and sister-in-law. He found the women waiting outside for him and the child. The group hurried back, but it was too late. The gangway had been lowered and the liner was already out in the river.

The uncle asked John Brennan, passenger manager of the line, to stop the ship and have the little girl put off in a tugboat, but Mr. Brennan would not take the risk of an accident.

Florence was held up to the rail by a stewardess and wafted a kiss to her weeping mother. A radio was sent to the Belgenland to have the child put in charge of a stewardess. Mrs. Ffelaere received a cabin in the Atlantic Transport liner Minnekahda, which left at 3 P. M. for Plymouth, Boulogne and London. Mr. Brennan said she would be landed at the French port and would reach Antwerp on Monday, June 9, about four hours after the Belgenland.

WOULD END SABBATH TESTS

Jewish Alliance Opposes Cornell Examinations on Saturday.

Efforts to amend the law providing for competitive State scholarship examinations at Cornell University on the "first Saturday in June in each year" will be made during the coming session of the Legislature by the Jewish Sabbath Alliance, it was announced yesterday by the Rev. Dr. Bernard Drachman, president of the organization.

Dr. Drachman said that on learning that this year's examination would be held next Saturday he urged that the date be changed so that Jewish students who observe the Sabbath might take it. Avery W. Skinner, director of the State examinations department, replied that the date was fixed by law. Dr. Drachman pointed out that the "examination ceases to be competitive inasmuch as it eliminates a certain group otherwise entitled to take the tests, and that this is rather a violation of the spirit of the law."

SON WRITES BIOGRAPHY OF MOODY, EVANGELIST

Life Story Based on Original Sources Includes Hitherto Undisclosed Letters.

A new biography of Dwight L. Moody, the evangelist, has just been completed by William Revell Moody, his elder son, and will be published by Macmillan Company, 60 Fifth Avenue, for circulation July 1.

He has been working on this volume for more than two years in the old homestead of his father at East Northfield, Mass., just across the campus from the Northfield Seminary, which the revivalist founded.

This will be the first complete account of the life and work of the evangelist, based entirely on original sources, it is said. It contains many heretofore unpublished letters.

"The book is a definitive biography of one of the outstanding figures of religious life of America," said a statement issued yesterday, "and brings out the real character of the man behind the great revivals that stirred the world in the latter part of the nineteenth century."

The book treats of Moody's early ministry during the Civil War and the days of reconstruction, the great revival in England and Scotland that revivified the Non-Conformist Churches of the British Isles, the founding of the Northfield Schools and Conferences and the expansion of the Young Men's Christian Association that followed the revivals.

Through the mass of historic detail, covering over sixty years and including references to most of the outstanding Protestants of the last generation, there is much detail not heretofore published in regard to character traits and methods of work.

The book includes statistics in regard to the extent of the work of the evangelist which have been compiled from many sources. It tells in detail of how D. L. Moody, accompanied by Ira D. Sankey, addressed audiences aggregating over 20,000,000 persons.

McKELVIE TO QUIT BOARD.

Nebraskan, However, Denies He Will Run for the Senate.

LINCOLN, Neb., May 31 (AP).—Here today on business prior to returning to Washington tomorrow, Samuel R. McKelvie, wheat member of the Federal Farm Board, announced that he would resign from the board but that he would not be a candidate for the Senate.

Mr. McKelvie, though not fixing a definite date for his retirement, intimated that it would be in two or three months.

"There are several phases of my work, particularly centring upon the development of group marketing, that I want to carry out before I leave the board," he stated.

In announcing his decision, Mr. McKelvie recalled that he had accepted the appointment on the condition that he should retire June 1 of this year. Continuing beyond that date, he explained, would permit him to fulfill his plans.

Emphatically denying that he would become a Senatorial candidate, or would consider any overtures toward that end, Mr. McKelvie said he would return to Lincoln, once off the board, to devote his entire time to his business interests.

ANNAPOLIS UNVEILS "GOD."

ANNAPOLIS, May 31 (AP).—The successor to Tecumseh, the Naval Academy's god of "Two-Point-Five," in bronze instead of the original wood, was unveiled today at a ceremony in which Secretary Adams and Rear Admiral Samuels Robison, superintendent of the academy, took part.

The original wooden statue was once the figurehead of the warship Delaware, which was sunk during the Civil War and raised again.

In front of Bancroft Hall the big figure has stood for decades, the mock patron saint of the middies. The passing grade in examinations at the academy is 2.5, and countless coins have been tossed at the feet of the image to gain its favor.

The bronze reproduction was the gift of the class of '91, decided on when the original figure showed signs of decay.

The new French motorship Lafayette was delayed fifteen minutes waiting for eighty passengers arriving by train from the West who were caught in the traffic jam.

Miss Marion Moore, younger daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Small Moore, was married to John W. Cross Jr., son of John W. Cross and the late Mrs. Cross of this city, yesterday afternoon in the Church of the Advent, Westbury, L. I. Because of the limited capacity of the church, only members of the two families and a few close friends witnessed the ceremony which was performed by Bishop Ernest M. Stires. The church was decorated with garden flowers from the estate of the bride's parents in Roslyn.

The bride was escorted by her father, who gave her in marriage. She wore a modified empire gown of ivory colored satin combined with old rose point lace. The lace made the short sleeves and outlined the round neck. The skirt, which was quite long, terminated in a long train and was embellished with the same lace. Her veil of tulle, arranged in cap fashion, fell in billowy folds to the end of the long train. She carried a bouquet of white orchids and wore a string of pearls.

Miss Fanny Moore, a cousin of the bride, was maid of honor. She wore a costume of apple green organdie made with a full skirt with inserts of lace, and a short cape which formed the sleeves. She wore a picture hat of the same color and carried an arm bouquet of yellow orchids.

The bridesmaids were the Misses Mari Boise of Scranton, Pa.; Barbara King of Chicago, Muriel Hedges and Frederica L. Frelinghuysen, whose marriage to Richard High Carleton Jr. will take place on June 14 in Madison, N. J. The bride is a granddaughter of Mrs. William H. Moore and the late Judge Moore, who for many years was an official and one of the prominent exhibitors of the National Horse Show. She is also a granddaughter of Mrs. James R. McGinley, who returned recently from Europe for the wedding, and the late Mr. McGinley.

Home Work Assailed as 'Legalized Criminality'; Prof. Nash Would End It for Younger Pupils

Elimination of home work, which he characterized as "legalized criminality," throughout the elementary and junior high school course was urged yesterday by Professor Jay B. Nash of the physical education department of New York University in the current issue of The School Parent, organ of the United Parents' Associations, Inc.

Last year Superintendent William J. O'Shea, taking a long step forward, eliminated written work and home reading assignments from the lowest three grades of elementary schools. He restricted and graduated the amount of home work that may be assigned by teachers from the fourth to the eighth year of school.

"Home work—long hours of home study—for the elementary school child and the junior high school child amounts to 'legalized criminality,'" Professor Nash wrote. "Home study cannot be justified in the light of modern psychology, philosophy or physiology. The practice is apparently based on a number of exploded theories."

The first of these "exploded theories," according to the professor, is that "home work is necessary for discipline to keep the child out of mischief." The second "false basis" cited by Professor Nash is "the old Puritan theory that play is a waste of time, even actually immoral."

Turning to a different line of attack, Professor Nash declared that children of ten need six or seven hours of vigorous physical activity daily, of which home work is not a variety. The educator also cited the necessity for easing the strains which, he said, eventually interfere with the nutritive process.

Professor Nash said that educators and the home are partly at fault for the emphasis on home work, but he also blamed society. "Children's games," he asserted, "constitute not only the moral 'equivalent to war,' but the 'moral equivalent to crime.' Filling the child's life with interest and providing activities in an atmosphere of freedom are the only possible ways to form a guarantee against delinquency and to give the child a leisure time is the equivalent of fullness of life."

Other articles in The School Parent extolled the virtues of home work elimination. Dr. Jacob M. Ross, principal of a Manhattan junior high school, explained Dr. O'Shea's regulations, and Miss Marguerite A. Johnson, principal of the Kensington School of Great Neck, N. Y., told of the success of an experiment of "no more home work" in her school.

BRITAIN AND CHURCH DRAFT MALTA PACT

Protocol Is Expected to Lead to Treaty Ending Conflict of Long Standing.

PREMIER IS STORM CENTRE

Lord Strickland, Himself Catholic, Aroused Bishops by Blocking Punishment of Pro-British Monk.

The last official act of Henry Getty Chilton, the retiring British Minister to the Court of Pope Pius XI, was to sign with the latter's Secretary of State, Cardinal Pacelli, a protocol which, when ratified, is expected to develop into a treaty in a short time regulating ecclesiastical and political affairs on the island of Malta, the great British naval base in the Mediterranean.

The treaty is expected to end a conflict between Church and State in the island, which had existed for more than thirty years with particularly heated conversations and demonstrations during the last fifteen months. The treaty will be the second international covenant entered into by the Vatican State. The first, after the promulgation of the Lateran treaty, was with Prussia, also signed by Cardinal Pacelli, when he was Papal Nuncio at Berlin, June 14, 1929.

The matter began to assume a serious aspect last March when Father Carta, Italian head of the Minorite Order of Malta, attempted to discipline Father Micalief, a Francescan monk and a British subject, by ordering him to Sicily. Lord Strickland, the Premier, ordered that no passport be issued to the monk as he was being punished on a political charge, because of his pro-British sentiments and his Majesty could not permit one of his loyal subjects to be treated in that manner.

Father Carta was supported in his effort to remove the monk by the Maltese hierarchy and ultimately by the then Papal Secretary of State, Cardinal Gasparri, and a caustic correspondence ensued, the British side unswerving in placing citizenship paramount to religious considerations and the Vatican maintaining the right of the orders to discipline members, regardless of their nationality, "unless otherwise arranged by treaty."

False Reports Broadcast.

As the chief sources of information on the subject abroad have been the Italian and Maltese press, much misinformation has been spread, such as stories of a conflict over the language question, with the British and Maltese arrayed on one side and the Italians with the Church on the other, and of an alleged anti-Catholic campaign supported by the government with retaliatory measures on the part of the clergy. Il Tevere, a Fascist paper of Rome, printed a circumstantial account of the Premier's alleged apostasy. He was said to be a Freemason and in secret communication with the enemies of Fascista Italy. An attempt was made to assassinate Lord Strickland a few days ago, after the government had postponed the elections because Mgr. Gonzi, Bishop of Gozo, had issued a pastoral forbidding Catholics to support the government party. This Bishop and Archbishop Caruana of Malta had issued a joint pastoral declaring it to be a "mortal sin" for any one to vote for Lord Strickland or any of his candidates.

Most of the news describing these and similar events has been so colored that two inferences were possible: that the present Maltese Government is anti-Catholic and that the Roman Catholic priesthood on the island is of Italian sympathies and allegiance. As a matter of fact, Lord Strickland and his entire Cabinet constitute what is probably the most uniformly Catholic government of any in Europe. He is descended from one of the oldest and staunchest Roman Catholic families in England. He was born in Malta of a Maltese mother noted for her piety.

Moreover, in accordance with information recently collected by the British authorities:

"The Maltese are undoubtedly loyal to the British flag, and certainly have no desire to be under any other. The Italian party, which is regarded as somewhat of a joke, is nothing but the invention of a very few, who utilize it as a means of currying favor in Italy as protectors of Fascista interests. Its only real influence is the preservation of Latin culture and art, and the retention of the Italian language compatibly with the teaching of English."

Last year two ecclesiastics investigated the situation, one sent directly by Cardinal Gasparri, and the other sent by him at the instance of the Strickland government and on representations made at the Vatican by the British Minister. The Cardinal's subsequent letter to the Bishops of Malta and Gozo was based on an aide-mémoire sent by his agent, which began as follows:

"It appears that Lord Strickland, who holds office not by nomination of the Imperial Government but by mandate received from the people, exceeds such mandate by not having any regard for the laws or for the rights and feelings of the clergy and the Roman Catholic population. Trustworthy witnesses do not hesitate to declare that Malta is at present subjected to a régime of terror and despotism in which the opposition in Parliament is disarmed and its press gagged, the courts are threatened, justice suspended, the Constitution in danger, the country in a ferment, and Church and religion openly insulted and opposed."

Second Inquiry Is Made.

The government thereupon informed the Papal Secretary of State that his letter had been based on misinformation and demanded that another investigator be sent. So Mgr. Robinson, a British subject, went to Malta. What he gave out there, as a result of his investigations, was said to be satisfactory both to the government and to the hierarchy. On his report Cardinal Gasparri dispatched to the Bishops another letter, hardly milder than the first. This letter was answered by Lord Strickland. According to the Osservatore Romano, his answer was condemned in Vatican circles as "offensive in tone, inaccurate in substance and inadequate in argument."

All these conversations took place between July and December last year. Meanwhile Father Carta had got into fresh trouble with the government. Ignoring his Majesty's postoffice, because he feared his letters to the Vatican might be tampered with, he had sent such letters through the agency of Commendatore Mazzone, a former Italian Vice Consul at Malta. Proceedings, which are still pending, were taken against both.

On the eve of the signing of the protocol by Cardinal Pacelli, who succeeded Cardinal Gasparri as Papal Secretary of State on Feb. 10, and Mr. Chilton, the Osservatore Romano, in a communiqué dated May 12, dealt with the pastoral letter of the Bishops, which had caused the government to postpone the elections.

The communiqué declares that the Holy Father does not concern himself with politics or parties, but only with religion and the welfare of the Church. Thus the hostility of the Vatican is confined to Lord Strickland personally, and to his persistent general policy of "northernizing" some of the ancient religious customs of the Maltese. The effect of his policy and views is held to be the undermining of the authority of the clergy and the faith of the people.

"Thus the hostility toward Lord Strickland extends to the Constitutional party only in so far as the party is instrumental in giving effect to the Prime Minister's views," the communiqué continues.

The communiqué holds the pastoral letter to be correct, being based on instructions issued by the Pope last year, "to act with due prudence in the defense of religion." "Parties" are not mentioned in the pastoral. It refers only to "candidates supporting Lord Strickland in his fight against the rights and discipline of the Church."

Preamble Explains Protocol.

The preamble to the protocol states that the primary object is "to establish the independence of the Church in Malta in all spiritual matters, consistent with the position of Malta as a dependency of the British Crown and as a self-governing unit of the empire."

The document then reviews the differences which have existed between the State and Church in Malta since the proclamation of 1828 limited the jurisdiction of ecclesiastics. The abrogation of this proclamation is required, also the abrogation of the proclamation of Jan. 1, 1838, which promulgated a law requiring the Governor's approbation for the validity of appointments to ecclesiastical offices or benefices by a foreign power. It is under this proclamation that Lord Strickland maintains his case against Father Carta.

It is then suggested that there shall be a concurrence of his Majesty's Government in the nomination of the Bishops of Malta and Gozo, and that these bishops shall be of Maltese nationality and acceptable to the people. It is also suggested that no foreigners shall be appointed as heads of religious orders in Malta, and that no appreciable percentage of foreign religious orders may be allowed in any monastery or convent. Moreover, "responsible ecclesiastical offices may be filled only by British-born subjects of British-born parents and educated in British institutions."

The protocol provides that the Maltese and English languages are to be adopted concurrently with Italian in all curia pronouncements; encouragement is to be given to sports and to the institutions of the Boy Scouts and the Girl Scouts, which have hitherto been practically prohibited by the ecclesiastical authorities of Malta.

N. Y. U. GIRLS TO RUN A CITY APARTMENT

"Family" of 12 Atop Downtown Centre Will Study Budget, Management and Diet.

WILL "BORROW" CHILDREN

Summer Course Will Stress Labor-Saving Devices, Marketing and Home-Making.

A novel arrangement through which twelve girls at the New York University Summer School will receive actual experience in the management of a city apartment, believed to be the first project of this kind in the city, was announced yesterday by Dr. Ralph E. Pickett, administrative head of the home making and home economics education department at the university.

The girls, according to Dr. Pickett, will make their home in the three-room practice apartment atop the new building of the School of Education at the Washington Square centre. They will plan, buy, prepare and serve their meals as a family group, manage the household accounts and have full responsibility for the maintenance of the rooms.

The apartment overlooks lower Manhattan and affords a wide view of the city's famous skyline. It is estimated by Dr. Pickett that a similar furnished apartment would rent for about $4,000 in the houses in the neighborhood.

On cool evenings, the students will have the facilities of a large open fireplace in the living room, while on warm evenings the roof garden will be available for their use. Although practice houses are in use in some large mid-Western universities, Dr. Pickett said this is the first time that a typical New York City apartment is being used.

Cultural Course Planned.

"In planning the course, we have looked at the home in its fullest sense, Mrs. Freda J. G. Winning of the Home Economics department said yesterday. "We have not contented ourselves with considering only the problems involved in cooking and sewing, laundering and cleaning.

"An important part of the work will be to teach the student how to live. Entertaining on a limited budget and the best ways of taking advantage of the cultural opportunities offered by New York will be a part of the course."

Instruction will be given in the use of the most recent labor-saving devices. The laundry and kitchen of the practice apartment have been equipped with the latest mechanical household aids, largely through the courtesy of manufacturers. Visits will be made to housekeeping institutes in New York and to textile mills and factories where household utensils are made.

Residence in the apartment will afford an opportunity to put into practice, under faculty supervision, the theories that are taught in the other courses offered by the department of home making and home economics this Summer, Dr. Pickett pointed out. For those students interested in preparing to be teachers and who wish to come in touch with the advances in the technique of teaching home economics and home making, a course has been planned dealing particularly with this philosophy.

Children to Be Borrowed.

Children of varying ages will be "borrowed" so that actual experience may be had in dealing with the problems of children's behavior and clothing, Dr. Pickett added. These children will become members of the practice house "family" and will be taken care of by the girls living there.

One course deals with the clothing problem of girls. The entire wardrobe of the young woman will be studied with reference to her needs, income and occupation. The problems of the individual purchaser as a consumer of clothing articles will be analyzed and studied. Students will also have an opportunity to visit the various fashion salons in this city.

The problem of food for the family will be taken up in another course. Students will receive an opportunity to study the nutritional needs of a family. Economy in living without losing sight of the esthetic aspects will be emphasized, as well as the actual planning and buying for the family meals.

These courses will be supplemented by one in food marketing. Visits will be made to wholesale and retail markets of New York City and talks by government officials in charge of marketing supervision have already been arranged. The students will also investigate various methods of advertising food products and the value of commercial brand names.

Contests Goshen Crossing Plans.

Special to The New York Times.

GOSHEN, May 31.—Civil engineers of the Erie Railroad and of the State Highway Department have submitted detailed plans for the abolition of two grade crossings in Goshen to the Public Service Commission, which disclosed that the railroad corporation is contesting part of the plan. The railroad contests the width provided for the overhead bridge, and also disputes the right of the State to assess part of the cost of a new spur highway. This is to hook up the two routes which are to be blocked by doing away with two crossings on the Pine Island branch of the Erie and providing a bridge to take the traffic of both routes.

PLAN CULTIVATION OF PAN-PACIFIC FOOD

Scientists to Study Plants in Experimental Garden on Hawaiian Mountain.

TO GATHER ALL VARIETIES

Site Offers Temperature Range From Tropical to Arctic for Crops of All Countries.

Plans for the establishment by international scientists and leading medical men of the world of a Pan-Pacific garden in Hawaii in which an effort will be made to raise every food and drug plant grown in countries bordering on the Pacific Ocean, whether in tropic or Arctic climes, were announced here yesterday by Alexander Hume Ford of Honolulu, founder and director of the Pan-Pacific Union.

Mr. Ford, who arrived recently from a trip to South American countries on the Pacific to solicit the aid of the governments of those States, told of the plans after they had been discussed both in New York and Washington by physicians and agricultural scientists. He said that plants from every Pacific country are now being gathered to try out the practicability of the scheme.

The preliminary results will be made known to the delegates to the Pan-Pacific Agricultural Conference at Honolulu next year and to the Pan-Pacific Medical Congress in 1933. One of the aims is to aid the Pacific countries, especially China, Japan and in the Far East, to solve their food supply and health problems. To this end, native foods and drugs will be studied scientifically and reported upon in the next few years.

Explaining the plan to collect native drugs and medicines, Mr. Ford said:

"Dr. Edward Hume, who was head of 'Yale in China' for many years, will aid us in collecting the Chinese exhibit, which is expected to be the largest, while Dr. Robert Pulleine of Adelaide will direct the gathering of aboriginal Australian remedies. He is asking Dr. Peter Buck, a full-blood Maori chief, a member of Parliament and one of the most distinguished medical men in New Zealand, to aid in making up the Polynesian collection. Dr. Albee is directing the collection from the Esquimos, and he will also try to get specimens of the herbs and medicines used by the North American Indians.

"All these plans have been discussed at our meetings in New York, at which Dr. Albee presided, and at which it was arranged to have textbooks on these and other subjects prepared by well-known medical men for use at the 1933 meeting. This congress will bring together especially those who have distinguished themselves in research in Oriental diseases. A study of this subject will be made at the meeting at the request of the Caribbean Tropical Medical Association, headed by Dr. William Deeks of New York, and the Far Eastern Tropical Medical Association."

OPPOSES BUILDING BRIDGE AT 57TH ST.

Fifth Av. Association Holds It Would Cut Realty Values and Increase Traffic Snarl.

HEARINGS ON WEDNESDAY

War Department to Reopen Discussions—Other Groups Expected to Re-enter Controversy.

The War Department will reopen hearings next Wednesday on the proposed construction of a vehicular and rapid-transit bridge across the Hudson at Fifty-seventh Street, and various New York groups are prepared to re-enter the controversy. Further down the river lies the scene of the more severe fighting in the New York-New Jersey difference, centring on the transportation of freight about the harbor without an added charge for lighterage from New Jersey rail ends. The controversy at Fifty-seventh Street, however, is intra-Manhattan, with traffic its central problem.

The Fifth Avenue Association announced yesterday that it would oppose the bridge proposal on the ground that it would reduce realty values, might cause a shift of business and take valuable property for use as approaches, besides centring a volume of traffic on Fifty-seventh Street that would create a serious problem. The association has supported the construction of the East River-Thirty-eighth Street tunnels and favors a Hudson River tunnel at Fifty-seventh Street.

Captain William J. Pedrick, executive vice president, declared that traffic relief was one of the city's great problems and that the proposed bridge would further involve the city's traffic. He said that 20,000,000 or more cars would be poured annually into Fifty-seventh Street by eight or ten bridge lanes, and most of them would be forced to use that street because the streets to the south are unable to serve and Central Park's location eliminates much of the space immediately north.

Says Plan Is Not New.

His statement is, in part, as follows:

"This bridge plan has been considered before and was opposed by our association for the same reasons that prompt our opposition now. In 1926 the chief consulting engineer of the Port Authority, appearing before our Fifty-seventh Street committee, outlined objections to the construction of a bridge at this location. He pointed out the bridge would have an hourly capacity of approximately 21,600 vehicles, which he said would equal the total traffic in a twelve-hour day on Fifth Avenue at Forty-second Street. Mr. Drinker, the chief engineer, estimated that the capacity of this bridge would nearly equal the entire north and south traffic movement in the borough of Manhattan. He was emphatic in his warnings to our committee regarding the serious effect which the tremendous vehicular load to be accommodated by the bridge would have on the streets in the vicinity of Fifty-seventh Street. It was brought out at that time that the interests of traffic in Manhattan would be much better served by the construction of a series of tunnels, between the Battery and 125th Street which would divide the flow of traffic and route it more directly to its points of destination.

"More recent studies have indicated the desirability of connecting the Hudson River crossings and the East River crossings with tunnels under Manhattan, as will be the case in the completed East River Thirty-eighth Street Weehawken Tunnel. Midtown Manhattan would not experience much relief from the construction of a tunnel under the East River and one under the Hudson River at Thirty-eighth Street without the connecting link under the streets of Manhattan. The same holds true of the Fifty-seventh Street situation, with the Queensboro Bridge on one side and the Fifty-seventh Street Hudson River Bridge on the other, pouring a constant double stream of truck and commercial traffic across one of the most important business streets in the city.

Urges Unity in Opposition.

"A street which caters to limousines, which has been so close to the development of Fifth Avenue that it has become a part of Fifth Avenue—this street cannot be asked to shoulder the burden of all the traffic that will flow between two industrial sections without losing its distinction as a retail business street. Business men, property owners and all the real estate interests in the Fifty-seventh Street district should unite to oppose the construction of this bridge. It would do more harm than good—in fact, it is difficult to see what good it would do or why it is needed at this point at all.

"As an indication of the value in which this street is held by those interested in the city's growth, upon objection from our association the Board of Transportation has practically abandoned the idea of building a subway link under Fifty-seventh Street from Sixth to Second Avenue because of the disturbance that the construction would cause business and property values during building operations. It was pointed out by us that the opening of the street for subway construction would set Fifty-seventh Street back several years and put a temporary check on a development which was only now coming into its own."

FAVORS 16TH ST. SITE FOR FREIGHT TERMINAL

Property Owner Writes to Cullman—23d Street Association Protests Location.

The Port Authority continues to accumulate evidence in favor of its proposal to build its first union inland freight terminal on the block bounded by Eighth and Ninth Avenues and Fifteenth and Sixteenth Streets, which is now being considered by Borough President Miller of Manhattan for report to the Board of Estimate.

Sidney L. Warsawer, a member of the Real Estate Board and owner of property at 88-90-92 Ninth Avenue and 361-3 West Sixteenth Street, has written to Commissioner Howard S. Cullman that he "cannot possibly conceive why there should be any opposition to this site, owing to its strategic location, besides being in an unrestricted area."

In a special report sent to Mr. Miller, the Twenty-third Street Association again voiced strenuous opposition by real estate interests to the proposed site.

All experienced real estate men in the Chelsea area are opposed to the location, the report declared. Among those whose opinions were cited were Harry N. Stein, Paul H. Fairchild of the James C. McCreery Realty Corporation, Henry Voorhis of Dwight, Voorhis & Perry and Walter A. Benkiser.

The Port Authority is seeking the approval of the Board of Estimate before the board adjourns for the Summer, as the two-month delay that would result otherwise would impede the program, which calls for the construction of three terminal buildings. Mr. Cullman points out the importance of the terminal to the ship lines in the following statement:

"There is one feature of this terminal project that has not been mentioned and it is quite important from the standpoint of providing adequate facilities for efficiently handling the port's commerce. I refer to the large number of piers, nearly forty, along Manhattan's waterfront now used by railroads as local freight stations, that can be released for steamship use.

"With the establishment of union inland freight stations some 2,000,000 tons of merchandise freight per annum will be eliminated from these piers, thus decreasing the demand for such facilities for railroad use. At the same time the railroads are giving consideration to the establishment of a modified form of store-door delivery on carload freight, which service would remove a large additional amount of business from the pier stations.

"These two major improvements in the manner of handling freight on Manhattan—namely, union inland freight stations for less-carload freight and store-door delivery for carload freight—are intimately related to each other and their inauguration will offer the triple benefits of reducing transportation costs to merchants and railroads and releasing additional piers for steamship use. The initial inland station, under consideration today, is merely the first step in this broad improvement program."

TRACES NEGRO SPIRITUALS.

Prof. Balanta Says Christianity Had Great Influence on Them.

The Negro spirituals now in vogue are based on primitive African rhythms, but their present form and development are due largely to Christianity, according to a statement issued yesterday through the Commission on Interracial Cooperation by Professor N. G. J. Balanta. Professor Balanta is a native of West Africa and for some years has been engaged in an effort to trace the sources and history of the spirituals.

"Christianity," he said, "was the force that breathed life into the innate musical talent of the African in his new environment. Far from his native land, despised by those among whom he lived, knowing the hard taskmaster, feeling the lash, the Negro seized Christianity, the religion of compensations in the life to come for the ills suffered in the present existence.

"The result was a body of songs voicing all the cardinal virtues of Christianity—patience, forbearance, love, faith and hope—through a modified form of primitive African music."

GEORGIA SHIPS FIRST OF PEACH CROP HERE

Initial Load of Raspberries Arrives From California—Melons Are Plentiful.

STRAWBERRIES COMING IN

16,000,000 Fresh Eggs Shipped Here—Buyers Warned Color of Shell Is No Sign of Quality.

New York fruit and vegetables markets retained their Summer appearance last week despite the unseasonable weather, Dr. Arthur E. Albrecht, director of the New York office of the State Department of Agriculture and Markets, reported yesterday in his weekly survey of market conditions. California shipped a large supply of cantaloupes and honeydew and honeyball melons as well as the first carload of red raspberries of the season, he said. The supply of cherries from this State is increasing rapidly.

New York had the distinction of receiving Georgia's first carload of 1930 peaches, Dr. Albrecht continued. The fruit was of the Mountain Rose variety and showed fine quality, color and size. North Carolina also sent its first shipment of peaches, which were of the Mayflower type.

Luscious watermelons from Florida made their initial appearance on local markets last week but, because of the cool weather, the demand was poor.

"Strawberries have been arriving from Virginia, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland and the Carolinas," continued the survey. "Blackberries, huckleberries and dewberries are also coming from the Carolinas.

"Most of the city's asparagus supply has been coming from New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland and Delaware.

"Supplies of string-beans were abundant from North Carolina and prices declined sharply at the end of the week. Virginia shipments have just begun and are replacing those from Florida, where the season is practically over.

"Tomatoes have been coming from Florida, Texas and South Carolina. With the opening of the tomato season in Mississippi, Eastern Texas, South Carolina and Ohio, supplies during the next month should be fairly heavy. Mississippi expects 1,685,000 bushels, or only slightly more than in 1929, but Eastern Texas may have a very large crop of 2,116,000 bushels from the greatly increased acreage in that section. South Carolina, Georgia and Louisiana together expect a total of 538,000 bushels, as against 383,000 last season. These five States may have a tomato crop about 30 per cent larger than their 1929 production.

"Green peas have commenced to arrive from New Jersey. This vegetable has also been available in moderate supply from California, North Carolina and Virginia. The preliminary estimate of the green pea acreage in New Jersey is 3,060 acres for the coming season as compared with 3,000 acres harvested last year.

"Approximately 16,000,000 fresh eggs are now coming into the local market each day, and at no time in the year is the quality finer than at present. The weather has been remarkably cool and most favorable for preserving the new-laid quality. There are no storage eggs now available nor will this class of stock be offered for sale until the Fall. The housewife, therefore, has nothing to fear as to the quality of the several grades now offered by independent retailers and chain stores at fairly reasonable prices.

"Consumers should again be acquainted with the fact that color of the shell has absolutely nothing to do with quality. White eggs look attractive but are seldom worth the extreme difference in price compared with browns. In the New England States, browns are preferred, while in New York the whites have the easiest sale. The latter frequently show pale yolks and are sought for cake purposes. Consumers should buy eggs according to the New York State retail egg grades. The grades established by the Department of Agriculture and Markets are 'Fancy Grade,' 'Grade A,' 'Grade B' and 'Grade C.'"

COMMUNIST GIRLS HELD.

Two Distributers of Bills to Soldiers Scorn Parole Pledge.

Two girls who were arrested after the Memorial Day parade on Friday because of their persistence in distributing Communist handbills to members of the 102d Engineers were arraigned before Magistrate Jacob Eilpern in the West Side Court yesterday on charges of disorderly conduct. They were held in $100 bail each for a hearing on Wednesday after they refused Magistrate Eilpern's offer to parole them on promises not to indulge in Communist activities between now and Wednesday.

The girls, Sophie Marino, 17 years old, of 1,200 East New York Avenue, Brooklyn, and Sophie Borginsky, 19, of 610 Oak Terrace, the Bronx, were arrested on the complaint of Lieutenant Walter Hayes of 1,630 Undercliff Avenue, the Bronx, who led Company E of the 102d Engineers in the parade. The girls were distributing their Communist literature in the Ninety-sixth Street station of the west side subway after the parade and refused to stop when so directed by Hayes.

TRADE IS OPTIMISTIC, BUT STILL CAUTIOUS

Hand-to-Mouth Buying Continues in Most Lines Throughout Country.

UNDERTONE SEEMS BETTER

Large Industries Show No Improvement, Though Structural Steel Demand Grows.

WEATHER AND HOLIDAY FELT

Outlook for June Appears More Bright in Reports From Federal Reserve Districts.

Although last week furnished further evidence of a more confident attitude in trade and industry, reports from various centres throughout the United States showed business generally feeling its way cautiously.

Taking the country as a whole, little change in basic conditions was reported. The complaint is quite general that buying is still limited to immediate or near-by requirements, with purchasers showing a reluctance to anticipate future needs. The outward aspects of trade and industry are such as to suggest that no appreciable upturn has taken place except in a few lines. Many observers, however, are becoming increasingly cheerful in their appraisals of the future, basing their beliefs more on the undertone of business than on visible conditions.

Weather a Halt on Trade.

Unseasonable weather in some areas was reported as a restraining influence in mercantile business last week. The prolonged week-end holiday was also a temporary drawback. Changes for the better, however, were noted in a few reports on retail and wholesale distribution. Merchants are entering the new month, it appears, with hopes of an early improvement notwithstanding the quietness in most populous centres at the close of May.

In large industries, such as steel, conditions have not improved, although the slightly lower rate of operations was attributed partly to a reduction in schedules with the approach of the week-end suspension. Some further shading of steel prices was reported, but steel manufacturers generally were said to be assuming a firmer attitude and resisting more stubbornly any tendency toward reduction of their profit margins. Substantial improvement was reported in lines affected by seasonal conditions. This was particularly true of steel for construction purposes. Pipe for natural gas lines is being bought in unusually large volume.

Wall Street's Indecision Fades.

In Wall Street there seemed to be less indecision at the week-end than at the close of the previous week. The stock market remained dull, but the pointing of prices upward when the market was more sensitive to trade trends than at any other time in recent months was regarded as significant. The financial community was heartened also because the decrease in earnings as well as in the general pace of business and industry is less pronounced than it was a short time ago.

Nowhere is it contended that a broad revival is in sight, but the attitude of Wall Street is that the worst has been seen and that all indications point to a slow recovery. A comparison of comments emanating from the New York financial district and from other centres discloses a more optimistic feeling in Wall Street than elsewhere.

TRADE HERE HOLDS LEVEL.

Slight Gain in Textile Buying—Department Stores Show Upturn.

Business conditions in New York last week were virtually unchanged from the week before. In the textile market demand for coarse yarn goods increased slightly, and sheetings were relatively more active, but the volume of sales was not significant except that it was larger than for several weeks. Department stores in the aggregate continued to report sales larger than in the preceding week and wholesale paper lines, laundries and wholesale millinery houses announced better sales than at the same time last year.

Most personal service and necessity stores continued to report business equal to that of a year before, especially in the manufacturing lines for women's clothing. Makers of cloaks and suits, hosiery and millinery are continuing to do business up to last year's volume. Sales of edibles of all kinds are also on a par with those of the period in 1929, while certain luxuries, including confectionery and tobacco, are holding up.

Almost every other line reports sales below those of a year before, including manufacturing, wholesaling, jobbing and retailing lines. As a whole, the pre-holiday offerings were not taken up in a manner that met expectations.

Of ninety-five lines of business reporting to Bradstreet's this week, four showed better business than, twenty-eight equal to and sixty-three below that of a year ago. No lines reported collections better than, twenty-five were equal to and seventy were below those of a year ago.

Following is a summary of the lines reporting sales:

Sales Better Than a Year Ago.

Department stores.
Laundries.
Millinery, wholesale.
Paper, newsprint, wholesale.

Aims to Save Insurance Policies In Peril From Market Loans

As many insurance policies on which loans were made at the time of the stock market crash last Fall are in danger of lapsing, the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company has adopted a plan of writing directly from the home offices to holders whose policies are thus in jeopardy.

This step has been taken in place of the usual custom of following up such policies through agents. It is reported that the purpose of writing directly is to assist holders who are interested in repaying their loans in instalments. The company states that it was faced with an abnormally large number of these loans last October and throughout the rest of the year.

UTILITY SEERS VIE FOR $10,000 PRIZE

American Superpower Directors Judging 438 Essays Covering Last Ten Years.

WRITTEN FIVE YEARS AGO

Decade's Progress, Half in Review, Half in Forecast, Subject in Bonbright Contest.

The fifteen directors of the American Superpower Corporation are acting as a board of judges to award a prize of $10,000 for the best review of the development of the electric power and light industry in the decade 1920-1930, written five years ago. The papers, numbering 438, were submitted on May 18, 1925, and are thus, in effect, a five years' review and a five years' forecast.

The announcement of the winning paper will be made in three weeks at the fifty-third annual convention of the National Electric Light Association in San Francisco, from June 16 to 20. The papers have been sealed and locked in a vault for five years, so that the accuracy with which the writers were able to predict the growth of the power and light industry from actual results in the first half of the decade is likely to arouse widespread interest.

The papers were written following the announcement by Bonbright & Co., Inc., in March, 1925, of prizes aggregating $10,000 for the best story of the electric power and light industry in the decade, each essay to be dated as of Jan. 1, 1930.

Bonbright Prizes Awarded.

At the annual convention of the National Electric Light Association in 1925, which was also held in San Francisco, President Franklin T. Griffith made the presentation of the Bonbright prizes, awarded to the authors of the twenty-three papers adjudged at that time as best conforming to the conditions of the contest as expressed in the following paragraph:

"This article by . . . presents in a clear and concise manner the story of the electric industry during the past ten years. It covers briefly the field of power and light operations and traces the modification and improvements in the generation, distribution and merchandising of electricity, as well as outlining the progress made in such important phases of the industry as public relations and financing methods."

At the request of the donors of the Bonbright prizes, the board of directors of the American Superpower Corporation consented to act as judges of the contest. In accepting they voted to supplement the Bonbright prizes with an additional single prize of $10,000, "in the name of the American Superpower Corporation, to be awarded to that contestant whose paper, reviewed again in 1930, shall appear to have most nearly approximated the facts as they eventuate."

David Cowan, then with the investment department of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada and now with the brokerage firm of McDougall & Cowans in Montreal, won the first prize of $5,000 in 1925. Robert M. Davis, then statistical editor of Electric World and now statistical editor for the McGraw-Hill Publishing Company in New York, took the second prize of $1,000. The third prize of $500 was awarded to John Dockendorf, who was then and still is connected with the Milwaukee Electric Railway and Light Company. Ten other prizes of $250 each and ten prizes of $100 each were awarded for other papers, contributed by men in a wide variety of occupations.

Marked Accuracy Shown.

A marked degree of accuracy was shown by some of the leading papers submitted, contrasted with the results of the full ten years as they are now known. A compilation giv-

OUTLOOK IMPROVED FOR RUBBER TRADE

Executives Think Stabilization Will Follow Drop of Price to New Low Level.

PROBLEMS BEING SOLVED

Competition and Distribution Improving as the Industry Becomes Centralized.

Rapid progress is being made toward the solution of problems which have confronted the American rubber industry in recent years despite the prevailing low prices for crude rubber, according to bankers who are identified with leading units of the industry.

History shows that the rubber industry has prospered when the price of rubber was high, despite poor business conditions, and that it has not done so well when rubber has slumped. The fact that crude rubber reached the lowest price on record on the Rubber Exchange of New York last Thursday has led executives of rubber companies to believe the commodity has reached a level below which it is not likely to go, and they are predicting a period of stabilization for the price during which rubber manufacturing companies may show normal earnings.

Three things in particular have affected the earning power of rubber companies in previous years, according to bankers. They were fluctuations in the price of rubber, too violent price-cutting in finished goods and inefficient distribution. These problems are being minimized, the bankers say, through concentration of the industry in fewer and larger units, for, following the trend in the steel, chemical and other basic industries, the rubber business is gradually being integrated into a few strong and responsible companies.

Production Being Centralized.

Thirty years ago more than 300 companies were manufacturing rubber products. Today thirty companies have 95 per cent of the production. Four companies have 66 per cent of the output, and ten companies have 80 per cent of it. In 1922 there were 166 companies making tires, but by 1926 the number had been reduced to ninety-three, and today there are fifty. The four largest companies, Goodrich, Goodyear, Firestone and United States Rubber, produce about 83 per cent of the nation's tire output, while six companies make about 95 per cent of it.

Despite a decline in the value of the industry's output since 1926, concentration of its production in the hands of a few large companies has proceeded rapidly, bankers report. Sales of the entire industry totaled $1,340,000,000 in 1926, of which the four largest companies contributed $738,476,000. In 1929 the sales volume was $1,146,900,000, of which the four largest companies produced $758,269,869. The decline in value of the output from 1926 to 1929 was caused partly by excessive competition and partly by a drop in the price of crude rubber from 76 cents a pound in 1926 to less than 20 cents a pound in 1929. Despite the shrinkage in crude prices, the four largest companies showed an increase in volume of business of about $20,000,000.

Possibilities of Expansion.

Bankers in Wall Street believe there are substantial possibilities for expansion in the rubber industry. Both in wider uses for rubber and in larger consumption of existing products, rubber holds out great promise for the future, they say. The most important outlet is, of course, the automobile trade, which takes about 82 per cent of the world's supply of crude rubber. Bankers identified with the rubber industry say there is a growing demand, both at home and abroad, for tires and motor accessories. Not only are more automobiles being placed in use each year, but more rubber is being put into cars and more into tires. The rubber industry therefore expects an increasing use of rubber for new car equipment and for tire replacement. The variety of uses for rubber in motor accessories is being enlarged each year. These now require between ten and twenty pounds of rubber for each car.

New uses are constantly being found for rubber outside of the motor industry, particularly in the chemical, iron and steel trades which are rapidly increasing their consumption of rubber. With the increased diversification of the rubber industry, bankers expect that it will be less dependent for its prosperity upon the automobile industry and will show a steadier trend of earnings.

Reduction of Competition.

Competition in the past has forced the prices of many rubber products down to unprofitable levels, according to rubber executives. Tires have been provided as new equipment on cars frequently at levels lower than cost, they say, but with the reduction in the number of companies in the industry, such merchandising methods are met less frequently.

Another factor in the stabilization of the industry, it is pointed out, is the more conservative policy which the rubber companies are following in maintaining inventories.

Manhattan-Dearborn and Lawbeck to Unite To Form $25,000,000 Financing Company

The Manhattan-Dearborn Corporation is planning to acquire the common stock of the Lawbeck Corporation, Lawrence Stern, president of both companies, announced yesterday. This transaction will give the Manhattan-Dearborn Corporation assets of $25,000,000.

Both of the companies to be merged are financial and banking concerns anr their unification is a logical step, Mr. Stern says, because their operations are in closely related fields. The directors and officers of the two companies are largely the same, both companies having been sponsored by Lawrence Stern & Co. and A. G. Becker & Co.

The proposed unification will not cause any change in the present management of the Lawbeck Corporation. The principal activities of this company have been in the making of short-term real estate loans upon properties which are suitable for later permanent financing by insurance companies and other lending institutions. In its operations the Lawbeck Corporation has made loans in excess of $50,000,000 and has participated in the financing of important real estate developments, particularly in New York.

The Manhattan-Dearborn Corporation was formed last August with an initial capitalization of $18,750,000. Among its directors are William Wrigley Jr., John Hertz, Albert D. Lasker, Charles S. Pearce, George Pick, Charles A. McCulloch, Herbert L. Stern and several of the active officers of Stern & Co. and Becker & Co.

Under the plan Manhattan-Dearborn Corporation will purchase the common stock of the Lawbeck Corporation at $7 a share, will guarantee the dividends on the Lawbeck 6 per cent preferred stock and will give holders of such preferred stock warrants entitling them to purchase common stock of the Manhattan-Dearborn Corporation within three years. The plan has been ratified by the board of directors and will be submitted to stockholders of both corporations for approval.

DIVIDENDS IN MAY UP BUT IRREGULAR

Declarations Made to Amount of $513,578,426, Despite Business Recession.

FEWER EXTRA PAYMENTS

Reduced Rates and Omissions of Distributions More Numerous Than a Year Ago.

Despite the slowing down in business in the first quarter of 1930 dividend declarations continue above those of the corresponding period of 1929. Payments in May aggregated $513,578,426, compared with $293,127,842 in April and with $472,639,206 in May, 1929. The disbursements, however, were not uniform. Several groups showed sharp declines compared with last year, notably the coppers and motors. Groups with increases over last year were in the majority, led by banks and insurance, oils, rails and steels. Although the aggregate for all classes was greater, which was accounted for by increases in capital made in the last year, the payments of extra and other special dividends was curtailed.

There were fewer back dividends paid and initial payments were less than half the number of those ordered a year ago. Dividends passed were double the number of those in May, 1929, while reduced payments were five times as numerous as a year ago. Stock dividends were approximately the same as in May, 1929.

Included in the special dividend declarations last month were extras of $1 on R. H. Macy & Co. common, and Bon Ami A shares, 75 cents quarterly on the new Warren Brothers common and an increase in the quarterly payment from $1.50 to $2 on the common stock of the International Salt Company. Payments on the common shares of Phillips Jones, the Mohawk Carpet Mills and the Gotham Silk Hosiery Mills were passed. Payments were resumed by the Atlantic, Gulf and West Indies Company with one of $1 on the common stock. A $30 liquidation dividend was declared by the Acushnet Mills of New Bedford, Mass.

Reduced payments were announced by several large industrial corporations, led by the copper companies. The Calumet and Arizona Mining Company, which had reduced its annual rate from $10 to $6 in the early months of the year, again reduced it to a $2 basis. The Inspiration Consolidated Copper Company reduced its quarterly dividend from $1 to 50 cents, and the Copper Range Company cut its distribution from $2 to $1 annually. The American Locomotive Company's dividend was reduced from $2 to $1 quarterly, and that on the common stock of the Studebaker Corporation was dropped to $1 from $1.25.

SILVER'S RECOVERY APPEARS REMOTE

Futures Are Now Quoted at Considerable Discount From Spot Prices.

EXCHANGE HARD HIT IN CHINA

Decreased Buying Power of the Country's Currency Retards Trade With Other Nations.

The silver market suffered the worst break of the year last week, prices here and in London dropping to the lowest levels in many years and resulting in a critical state of affairs in Chinese exchange. Four Chinese exchange banks in Shanghai are reported to have closed their doors last week as a direct result of the break in bar silver prices.

The principal reasons for the present conditions in the silver market have been the continuance of high production, the seeming inability of China to absorb sufficient amounts of the metal to stabilize the market and the political unrest in India, which has placed trading in silver in Bombay under a severe handicap. The outlook for the silver market is not at all promising in view of the fact that futures are quoted at a considerable discount from spot prices.

On three days last week silver prices broke badly both here and in London. On Monday, bar silver in New York dropped ¾ of a cent an ounce to 39¼ cents, while in London the market was off 7-16d to a price of 18 3-16d. On Tuesday the market rallied 1-6d in London, but remained unchanged here.

Severe Break on Wednesday.

The most severe break of the week occurred on Wednesday, when the quotation in New York fell 1¼ cents to 38 cents an ounce, while in London the drop amounted to ¼d, bringing the price down to 18d. Then on Thursday our market was off ¾ of a cent, making the quotation 37¼ cents, while the London dealers quoted a price of 17 7-16d, a net decline for the day of 9-16d.

The consequent drop in the Shanghai, Hongkong and Peking exchange rates brought quotations to the lowest in many years. The Chinese dollar at par is worth 50 cents in United States currency, but at the present rate it is worth only about 35 cents. The Indian rupee has also declined, but to a lesser extent. The Japanese yen, being on a gold basis, has, of course, not been affected primarily with the drop in silver, although the Japanese trade with China is naturally greatly affected by the depreciation in Chinese exchange.

American Trade Also Affected.

By the same token the trade of the United States and other nations with China is seriously affected by the decreased buying power of the Chinese dollar. China has been forced to enter the silver market during recent weeks to sell a considerable amount of the metal in order to meet foreign trade balances, although at the same time injuring her own currency by so doing.

Since the first of the year bar silver in New York has dropped 9¼ cents an ounce, as the final quotation in December was 46½ cents. During the period the price in London has gone from 21 5-16d to 17 7-16d.

So far as the Bombay market for silver is concerned, India at best is not a large potential market for the metal. In the circumstances, therefore, any increase in the purchases of silver in Bombay is not expected to improve prices to any extent, or even steady the market.

The break in the Chinese exchange rates in sympathy with silver is due to the fact that the silver currencies cannot be measured by the face value, but by their silver content.

TRUST STOCK PRICES SHOW LITTLE GAIN

26 Issues Selling at 84.73% of Asset Value, Against 84.19 on Jan. 2 Last.

EARLIER RISE SHORT-LIVED

Efforts at Market Support Only Partly Successful—Reaction From Popularity Seen.

Investment trust stocks are now selling at practically as great a discount from asset value as they were at the beginning of the year, according to a statistical survey of a group of representative trust issues made by THE NEW YORK TIMES.

The study shows that twenty-six stocks of investment trusts were selling at prices which averaged 84.19 per cent of asset value of the underlying securities on Jan. 2 of this year, while the same group of securities was selling at 84.73 per cent of asset value, based on current market values, as of last Wednesday's closing prices.

The survey includes a representative list of investment trusts whose securities are traded on the New York Stock Exchange, the Curb Exchange, over-the-counter, the Produce Exchange and in Boston. It includes mostly companies whose portfolios include general lists of investments, but there are several specializing in definite groups of industries.

Earlier in the year, the trusts had made moderately good headway towards closing the gap which existed between the market price of their securities and the current asset share value of these securities, based on current market figures, and there was a feeling that the public was regaining interest in these issues.

Earlier Revival of Stocks.

Following on the heels of the revival in public utility issues, and moving somewhat faster than the upswing in industrial stocks, investment trust securities were apparently returning more nearly to the comfortable position they held before the stock market disaster last Fall.

It has been estimated that on April 15 the average discount on investment trust stocks had been reduced to between 5 and 10 per cent. Charts show that the trusts have moved faster in both directions than the average run of stocks this year, and that the movements have usually begun in advance of the establishment of a new trend in the general market.

The decline which was felt sharply in the general market around May 1 began in the investment trust issues shortly atfer the middle of April. The gap of discount began to widen, and those few companies which were selling at a premium saw their margins become more and more slender.

Up to the present time investment trust issues have not only failed to show any substantial rally, but in many cases they have continued to fall off fractional points day after day, until at present the discount is only slightly more than one-half of 1 per cent smaller than it was at the first of the year.

A significant factor, conspicuous in the survey, is that of market support either by the trust itself or by its banking affiliates. Several of the larger trusts have made active efforts to bring the market prices of their securities more closely in line with asset value. Others have made serious attempts to peg their stocks so that they would not fall below certain market levels.

Efforts at Support Helpful.

In no known instance has any of these efforts been completely successful, but there are strong evidences that in cases where this kind of support has been given the disparity between the two prices has not widened and has in most cases been reduced.

Smaller trusts, however, which have had greater difficulty in making a market for their stocks, and some larger ones which, for one reason or another, have found themselves in public disfavor, are selling now at prices decidedly below those of the first of the year. Of the twenty-six trusts, thirteen are selling at discounts slightly smaller than at the first of the year; twelve are selling at larger discounts, while one is selling on the same basis as on Jan. 2.

Of this group, only four are selling at premiums, that is, at prices above their asset values, and one is selling exactly at asset value. The rest are below, with only two above 90 per cent. Fourteen are selling below 80 per cent, with one as low as 62 per cent and two at 72 per cent.

Reasons for this sharp drop back to the prices of the first of the year are many, investment trust observers say. The primary one, it is held, is that the public has not yet regained the confidence it once held in the securities of trusts in general. The present reaction, it is said, is from the unbounded and extreme popularity of the issues a year ago.

Another reason, it is said, is that there are many things going on under the surface in investment trust circles. Mergers are being talked generally, and there is at least one instance of impending new financing.

900 Claimants to Receive Second Dividend From Funds of Defunct Indemnity Company

A second distribution of 10 per cent to claimants against the Fifth Avenue Mutual Indemnity Company has been announced by Albert Conway, State Superintendent of Insurance, in whose department the compaany was placed for liquidation on April 19, 1926, after less than a year of operation. Checks for the disbursement were mailed yesterday to about 900 claimants, the majority of whom were entitled to benefits due to injuries in automobile accidents or are beneficiaries of persons killed in automobile accidents.

This is the second division which has been declared by the Insurance Department since it took over the company. About a year ago a 30 per cent dividend was declared, and soon afterward the Supreme Court authorized Mr. Conway to declare dividends as rapidly as funds accumulated. The funds are derived from the collection of a 200 per cent assessment placed on all policy holders. While Mr. Conway has had to bring suits in hundreds of cases to collect the assessment, he is of the opinion that another dividend will be declared, but probably not for a year or more.

The Fifth Avenue Mutual Indemnity Company was organized in 1925 to transact business of automobile liability insurance, confined to insuring public motor vehicles required by the highway law to be insured. It had offices at 1,775 Broadway. On April 19, 1926, when it was put into the hands of the Insurance Department for liquidation, it had assets of $244,238 and claims amounted to $1,845,437. Practically all of these claims weer adjusted or settled and then the 30 per cent dividend was declared.

This dividend exhausted the assets of the company and a 200 per cent assessment was levied upon the members and policy holders. As soon as the collections from this source made it possible to pay the additional 10 per cent dividend Mr. Conway had the checks prepared and mailed. He is now engaged in collecting funds for another dividend, the amount of which will depend upon the collection.

Committee Will Regulate World's Tin Production

A special committee to deal with the regulation of tin production throughout the world has been appointed by the council of the Tin Producers' Association. This committee held its first session in London on Friday, and complete agreement was reached on all points under discussion, according to reports received by members of the tin trade here.

The following have accepted office on the special committee: F. J. Houwert and J. Van den Broek of the Billiton Company, Dutch East Indies; F. E. Nair and C. V. Stevens, representing the Tin Producers' Association, Malayan section; Antenor Patino and Martinez Vargas, representing Bolivia, and John Howeson, representing the Nigerian section of the association.

Acquisition of Stocks of Three Companies by Pacific Gas and Electric Approved.

COMMISSION LOOKS AHEAD

Defers Deals for Properties—Expects Lowering of Rates for Public's Benefit.

The California Railroad Commission by approving a few days ago the acquisition by the Pacific Gas and Electric Company of the North American Company's stock holdings in the Great Western Power Company, the San Joaquin Light and Power Corporation and the Midland Counties Public Service Corporation, all of California, allowed a $650,000,000 utility merger to proceed.

The commission dismissed without prejudice, however, the Pacific Company's request for permission to acquire the properties and businesses of the three companies and their subsidiaries, characterizing the request as "premature." In so doing, it gave notice that it will require the Pacific Company to transform into lower rates at least a part of the savings to be effected as a result of economies which can be made prior to the complete merger.

Price Not Basis for Rates.

The authority granted by the commission to acquire the stocks of the companies was conditioned upon the provision that the consideration paid for such stocks shall not be urged before the commission as fixing the cost or value of the properties of any of the companies mentioned, for rate fixing, transfer or accounting purposes, or for further security issues.

In its opinion, the commission pointed out that it is of record that the purchase of the stocks is the first step in a plan for acquisition by the Pacific Gas and Electric Company of the North American properties in California, and that the Pacific Company asked for authority to issue additional stock of the acquired companies and aims eventually to take over the businesses and properties of those companies and their subsidiaries. The commission calls attention to the fact that there is nothing in the record to show on what terms the Pacific company proposes to acquire such additional stocks, or what it intends to pay for the properties.

Continuing, the commission says:

"While we believe that the consolidation of the properties should follow the acquisition of their control through stock ownership, we cannot on the record before us either, authorize the applicant to acquire additional stock or to acquire the properties of the aforesaid companies, or determine whether the cost of the properties to applicant may be charged to capital account and current assets.

Precedents to Be Followed.

"It seems to us that these requests are all premature. These matters will be determined when properly before us. Unless facts are presented at the time which warrant a departure from past decisions of the commission, such decisions will be adhered to and followed when we are called upon to decide what charges may be made to fixed capital accounts and current assets when Pacific Gas and Electric Company acquires the properties of Great Western, San Joaquin, Midland Counties companies and their respective subsidiaries.

"In view of the fact that the order herein will be confined to the acquisition by applicant of the stocks mentioned, and the issue of stock by applicant and matters collateral thereto, we believe the motion of the city attorney of Oakland, that the commission direct a complete new valuation of the properties mentioned in this proceeding be made, should be denied. Preparation of such a valuation is unnecessary for the purpose of this proceeding. By denying Comparison With March Figures Indicates Better Showing for April.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES UP

Record Total in Recent Months Exceeds Pledge Given to President Hoover.

ROADS HIGHLY EFFICIENT

Increase in Traffic Not Accompanied by Corresponding Rise in Expenses.

Railroad men last week were inclined in some cases to feel that the bottom of the declining trend in railroad earnings had about been reached. Figures for the first seventy railroads to report for April, showing a decrease of 12 per cent in gross and of 33 per cent in net operating income, were compared with the results of preceding months this year. In March net for all Class I railroads declined 37.3 per cent, so that if the ratio of the seventy railroads to report for April is maintained complete returns for April will show an improvement over March. The decline in net for February was 29.8 per cent and for January 28.2 per cent.

March gross was the lowest for any March since 1920, and March net operating income was the lowest for any March since 1922. Gross and net earnings for the first quarter were below the totals in the corresponding quarter for every year since 1922.

The following table shows how gross and net for the first quarter compare for the years from 1930 to 1922:

Year.	Gross.	Net Op. Inc.
1930	$1,331,982,485	$176,253,628

Record Capital Expenditures.

It has been pointed out that some of the decline in net operating income reported for the first months of the year resulted from large capital expenditures made by the railroads in response to the request of President Hoover. Capital expenditures reached a record figure in recent months and exceeded the figure pledged to President Hoover. In later months this year the expenditure ratio is expected to lighten.

Most railroad officials have predicted an improvement around midyear. Recent signs of improvement here and there are seen as tending to confirm this prediction.

The car loadings figures have since the beginning of the year shown how current conditions have affected the earnings of the railroads. The recession in trade has been reflected in substantially lowered miscellaneous freight and less-than-car-lots figures. As has happened in the past, coal loadings have been disappointing. Grain and grain products have made a better showing, but, on the other hand, movement of grain was lower than usual last year.

The railroads, it is pointed out, have reached a state of efficiency where they can carry vastly larger traffic without a commensurate increase in operating expenses. The record net returns made by the roads in 1929 resulted from this efficiency plus record volume of traffic. A cut in traffic, such as the railroads have suffered this year, makes a correspondingly large decrease in net.

It has been pointed out that the amount of traffic carried by the railroads does not increase in proportion with national production as a whole. The motor vehicle has cut directly into the business of the railroads, although it has contributed indirectly to their business by increasing the traffic in steel, oil, gasoline, road materials and other commodities pertaining to motor transportation. This indirect increase, however, is not sufficient to offset the direct decrease.

Serious Condition Seen.

The Cleveland Trust Company's business bulletin describes this condition as "a truly serious situation." It asserts that railroad business is not increasing as fast as other business and that "railroad business suffers more severely than general business in each period of depression and recovers less vigorously than general business in each period of prosperity."

The bulletin publishes a chart showing how the increase in general business and railroad business ran closely together from 1906 to 1920. The analysis said:

"During the first fifteen years of the period [from 1906 to 1930] the two lines of production and of freight run so closely together as to indicate that practically constant proportions of all national production were being transported by the railroads. Since 1920 this relationship no longer exists. The motor truck is cutting into the railroad freight business just as surely, although not as seriously, as the motor car is diminishing the railroad passenger business. In both cases it is the short-haul business that is most seriously affected, and in both cases the results are progressive in nature.

"One interesting feature of the diagram is that the dashed line, representing the freight, drops further in each year of downturn than does the production line, and does not recover so far in the years of increasing prosperity. This was not the case in the years before the war, but latterly it has been becoming increasingly evident. It seems to be clear that it is happening again, and in even more serious degree, in the present period of depressed business, for railroad earnings so far this year have suffered more severely than most other kinds of earnings."

Coal Pier for the C. & O.

A contract has been awarded by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company to the W. Horace Williams Company of New Orleans for the construction of a fireproof coal pier at Newport News, Va. This contract is exclusive of machinery. The contract is expected to be completed in about seven months. When the machinery has been erected the pier will be capable of loading coal on any ship now in ocean trade.

FINANCIAL MARKETS

Stock Exchange Closed—A Week Which Brought No Change in the Situation.

With the Stock Exchange closed for an extra holiday yesterday, the usual early Summer inactivity in all markets was emphasized. Neither at home nor abroad were there any developments of consequence, nor did any seem to be foreshadowed for the coming week.

The only incidents which stood out in last week's financial and industrial situation from the generally motionless picture were the continuing decrease in railway traffic as compared with nearly all years since 1922, the further gradual marking-down of prices in the steel trade and, as a reminder of political rather than financial circumstances, the fall in silver bullion considerably below the previous low level. The very disappointing movement of goods for distribution by railway to consumers is the most striking phenomenon of the period. The scope of this reduction may be judged from the Railway Association's classified tables of loadings, which show for the year to date not only a decrease of 8 and 9 per cent from 1929 and 1928, respectively, but considerably the smallest total for the period since 1922.

Small-lot merchandise foots up the lowest since 1924, miscellaneous freight the lowest since 1925, coal shipments fall below any year since 1922, grain below any since 1921. This is a pretty general shrinkage, and the latest weekly returns make no better comparison than the five months' total. Its ulterior result has been the smallest railway gross revenue since 1922 for the year to date; but the larger implication is the great reduction, either in consumers' purchasing capacity or in their willingness to purchase. It is in this direction that the turn for the better must be sought, when it is time for it to come.

The still receding prices for steel products have one obvious explanation in the same curtailment of demand, whether for railway material and equipment or for the motor-car industry or for building construction. The trade itself also assigns, as it did in 1927 and 1924, the constant increase in available producing capacity. Yet it is not easy to see how that could have been avoided, when it is only twelve months since the steel mills found themselves producing and marketing their product up to 100 per cent of theoretical capacity. In many articles, the fall of commodity prices has lately appeared to be arrested; certainly the grain and cotton and copper markets have steadied during the present months. But there still seems to be an ebbing-away of values in a variety of miscellaneous products; for the weekly commodity price averages have been reduced in every week since the early part of April and are now about 2½ per cent below the last week of that month. This is the second part of the picture where the turn for the better ought in due course to be indicated.

Such a turn, when it comes, is rather apt to come suddenly, but for that there is usually some special cause. In 1924 it was the unexpected fortune of the grain producers, with a foreign shortage in the face of abundant home production. In 1915 it was belligerent Europe's adoption of the policy of acquiring all the war munitions that foreign plants could possibly turn out. Several periods of depression before the war were terminated by trade recovery in Europe, which sent peremptory foreign buying orders into the American markets. It is too early even to guess what may serve the purpose at the present juncture. It may be only accumulation of deferred requirements by consumers, which sometimes (as in the Autumn of 1922) have seemed suddenly, and without warning, to drive into the markets an army of merchants who found their stock of goods exhausted in the face of the new demands.

These figures indicate that the industry actually exceeded the reasoned prophecies of the leading contestants for the Bonbright prizes. An analogy is said to exist in the fact that expenditures for additions and betterments by electric power companies this year are being made in larger amounts than was estimated by the industry's executives when they outlined their proposed construction program for 1930 to President Hoover last November.

The 1930 award of the American Superpower Corporation will be presented by Franklin T. Griffith on June 19. All but three of the present directors of American Superpower Corporation acted as judges in 1925 as well.

TOPICS IN WALL STREET.

News, Comment and Incident, On the Stock Exchange and In the Financial Markets.

With the securities exchanges and most of the commodity markets closed, Wall Street was virtually on a holiday basis yesterday. The banks were open, as were the commodity sections of the New York Produce Exchange, but otherwise business was suspended in the financial district. The New York Stock Exchange, the Curb and the securities market of the Produce Exchange exteded their Memorial Day shut-down through the rest of the week-end. The Chicago Board of Trade and the New Orleans Cotton Exchange were open as usual. Business will be resumed in all centres tomorrow.

Summer Stock Markets.

A common prediction in Wall Street has lately been for very inactive stock markets during the Summer season. The tradition of dull markets in the midsummer months is so well established that probably nothing else would be expected if it had not been that in 1929, as in some other years, such as 1919 and 1915, Summer was a season of great speculative activity. In looking up last week the market's record during a shares were dealt in, and three in in 1928 there were eighteen five-hour days in July when less than 2,000,000 shares were dealt in and three in August; also that there was no 3,000,000-share day during that entire Summer until the last week of August. In July, 1927, only four days reached 2,000,000 shares, and only eight in August. In July of 1926 there were only two days with 2,000,000 shares, and only five in August. In the same two months of 1925 there was no 2,000,000-share day, and there were four full days with 1,000,000 shares, one of them accounting for only 800,000 shares.

Floating Supply of Stocks.

A Wall Street expert who recently conducted a canvass of the large commission houses has convinced himself that the "floating supply" of sound stocks is smaller than it has been in some years. His inquiry was directed particularly toward ascertaining the amount of United States Steel common in brokers' hands, but he professed to have found that the stocks of other large enterprises have been going into strongboxes at a surprising rate.

Cheap Money the World Over.

Yesterday's reduction to 2⅛ per cent in the London open market for three months' discounts fixed the lowest rate since the Summer of 1922, when rates for the same class of loans went temporarily to 1¾ per cent. The Paris open market discount rate of 2¼ per cent, although not changed for the week, is the lowest figure reached since long before the war. At Berlin the current charge of 3¾ per cent for discounts is the lowest since early in 1914. Bankers generally regard these abnormally low European rates as a measure of the season's financial and industrial reaction in Europe, but it was also generally agreed that, in the long run, money obtainable on such easy terms must have a stimulating effect on European business. One interesting aspect of the world money market is that open market discounts at London and Paris are now fully 1 per cent below the general rate for three months' bills on Walls Street. No such comparison has been possible at any time since the war, except during periods of Wall Street speculation, when New York money rates were bid up to extravagant values.

Balancing the Speculative Account.

Market interests never lose an opportunity to stress the number of "new highs" that are made in days of advancing prices on the Stock Exchange. Last week a statistician showed, however, that the number of stocks making "new lows" for 1930 has been increasing to such an extent as to more than offset the number of "new highs."

Railroads and Other Industries.

Figures were published in a bulletin of the Cleveland Trust Company recently to show that the business of the railroads has not in recent years grown in comparison with the expansion in general business, and that the railroads are more sharply affected by depression than are other industries. Railroad men have long recognized that the motor vehicle has taken much traffic from them, but they have also pointed out that the motor has contributed traffic by increasing the movement of steel and other materials used in automotive construction, of oil and gasoline, and of road materials. Moreover, it was declared, growth of American industry was made possible by the pioneering of the railroads. It was therefore considered only natural that industry as a whole should go ahead faster than the railroads, once the railroads had broken the ground for industry.

The Swing of Silver's Price.

The decline in silver bullion at London last week from 18⅝ pence per ounce to 17 7-16 fixed an absolute low record price for the metal. Until this year 22½ pence was the lowest price ever reached, and the present figure is barely one-half of the value quoted as lately as November, 1924. Even in 1921, when reaction of all commodities from the inflated prices of the previous year was most violent, the lowest price reached by silver was 30⅝ pence, which is nearly 80 per cent higher than this week's low figure. In that respect the fall in silver has not been similar to the decline of other commodities, but its course during and immediately after the war was strikingly similar to that of the others. On the outbreak of the war, silver was selling in London at 26 pence per ounce. It declined to 22⅛ in the late months of 1914, recovered to 49½ at the time of the armistice, rose to 89½ in 1920 and fell to 30⅝ in the following year.

Investment Trust Listings.

The roll of investment trusts listed on the New York Stock Exchange has been increased by two to twenty-two. In the meantime more and more trusts are listing their securities on the Curb Exchange. This active trend toward the listing of their securities on more broadly recognized exchanges on the part of investment trusts is seen in Wall Street as a more definite effort on the part of executives of such companies to obtain a wider recognition for their securities and thus to assist in the rehabilitation, as far as public confidence goes, of the business generally.

"Americanizing" Foreign Railways.

The departure of Ralph Budd, president of the Great Northern, on a mission to Americanize the railroads of Russia, was cited as an example of how American transportation methods are gaining recognition abroad. His departure also aroused recollections of the experience of J. J. Mantell, former Erie executive, who recently went to China to survey the railroads there. In the course of his visit, Mr. Mantell engaged in a verbal controversy with the Russian Government at the time that country was at odds with China, and some observers thought it ironical that another American railroader should now be enlisted on the other side. However, the point was stressed that Mr. Budd will visit Russia as a railroad operator only and that he would be the last man to become involved in anything but a railroad problem. The selection of Mr. Budd by the Russian Government was considered wise in view of the fact that Mr. Budd not only heads a large railroad here but operates it in climatic conditions similar to that of Russia.

Week's Movement of Gold.

The movement of gold at the Port of New York last week consisted of imports of $120,000, chiefly from Latin-America, and exports of $50,000 for Argentina. The Federal Reserve Bank reported no change during the week in the gold earmarked here for foreign account.

TRADING IN STOCKS DECLINED IN MAY

Turnover on Stock Exchange 78,040,030 Shares, and on Curb, 22,764,670.

TWO REACTIONS IN MONTH

Prices Moving Upward at Close—Transactions in Bonds Also Reduced.

Transactions on the New York Stock Exchange last month fell off sharply after heavy trading on the first five days. Sales totaled 78,040,030 shares, compared with 111,041,000 shares in April and with 91,283,550 shares in the corresponding month a year ago. The heaviest day's trading last month was on May 5, when 8,279,260 shares were dealt in. This is also the largest day's trading this year. All records for a two-hour session were broken on Saturday, May 3, when 4,867,530 shares changed hands.

The trend of prices last month was irregularly higher after severe reactions on the first three days of trading. THE NEW YORK TIMES's combined averages registered a loss of 16.09 points for the three days. The market rallied sharply on May 6, which was reflected in a gain of 6.44 points in the averages. This was followed by irregularly higher movements until May 19, when another slight reaction occurred. This decline, as measured by the combined averages, was 4.21 points. Prices again turned irregular, with trading on a small scale, and continued in this fashion until the final week of trading, when there was a slightly better demand for stocks at higher levels.

Transactions in stocks for May and from Jan. 1 this year compare as follows with preceding years:

New York Telephone Company Makes Additional Authorizations.

The directors of the New York Telephone Company have authorized additional expenditures of $3,928,645 for construction throughout the State, increasing appropriations made this year to $50,220,815, of which $42,340,765 was for the metropolitan area.

The appropriations for Manhattan provide for a new information bureau at 425 West Fiftieth Street and new dial centres at 227 East Thirtieth Street and 151 East Ninety-seventh Street. Hempstead will get two new switchboards, one for local and one for toll service, and Brooklyn will get a new information bureau at 360 Troy Avenue as well as additions to the Floral Park and Amityville switchboards.

TRAINS NIP TIME ONE HOUR.

New Schedule of 61 Hours, Chicago to Portland and Seattle.

Passenger service from Chicago to Portland and Seattle is being speeded up one hour today by transcontinental roads serving the Northwest. The new schedule is sixty-one hours. None of the trains charges extra fare.

The reduction in running time is the fourth announced in the last year. The Great Northern, which introduced the Empire Builder on June 10, last year, with a five-hour time slash, opened the way for a speeding up of all roads serving the territory.

Today's sixty-one-hour schedule is eleven hours under the running time at the end of the war. Further reductions are not probable.

POWER REVENUE INCREASES

Gain of 25% Indicated for April Compared With Year Ago.

April revenue of electric light and power companies promises to show an increase of about 2.5 per cent over that of April, 1929, and 12 per cent over the same month in 1928, according to a preliminary estimate made by The Electric World on the basis of reports from electric light and power companies.

"The gain, though not large, means, nevertheless, that 1930 earnings have been greater month by month than those of any previous year," the magazine says. "April showed a smaller increase than March, when compared with 1929, but not when compared with 1928."

An investment in Cities Service is an investment in more than 100 public utility and petroleum companies.

Another Record Year for Cities Service

In 1929 Cities Service Company reported large increases over all previous years in assets, gross earnings, net earnings, and the number of its security holders.

The 20th Annual Report of Cities Service Company is now in the hands of the company's 438,000 Preferred and Common stockholders and will be sent to other investors on request.

FLOTATIONS IN MAY WERE $708,941,000

Compare With $812,989,000 in April—$579,780,000 Bonds, $129,161,000 Stocks.

107 ISSUES PUT ON MARKET

Five Months' Total $3,429,283,236, Against $3,269,922,893 a Year Ago.

Securities publicly offered in May were slightly less in the aggregate than in April. Bond offerings were about equal to those of April, but stocks fell well below the previous month. The total for the month was $708,941,000, of which $579,780,000 was in bonds and $129,161,000 in stocks, compared with $812,989,000 in April, when $603,762,000 in bonds and $209,227,000 in stocks were offered. In May, 1929, new offerings amounted to $623,491,000, divided into $308,018,000 in bonds and $315,473,000 in stocks.

The offering of securities for the five months ended with May is well above the total last year, at $3,429,283,236, against $3,269,922,893. The bond total showed an advance amounting to $2,905,558,000, against $1,713,437,178 last year, whereas stock offerings show a sharp decline from last year, totaling $523,725,236, compared with $1,556,485,715. Last year when the public interest in stocks was at its height bond offerings were overshadowed by the volume of new investment trust stock brought out. This year, however, this type of offering has been almost negligible.

New bonds offered last month numbered ninety-two, against 119 in April and eighty-six in May, 1929. The number of stock issues last month was fifteen, compared with seventeen in April and fifty-four in May, 1929. For the five months ended with May 482 issues of bonds and sixty-seven of stocks were offered, compared with 377 and 315, respectively, a year ago.

Stock issues offered included General Theatres Equipment, Inc., voting trust certificates for common shares; National Power and Light Company $6 preferred and Gibralter Finance Corporation of New York common, Class A.

STOCKS CLOSE WEAK ON BERLIN EXCHANGE

Boerse Affected by Wall Street's Holiday and Delay in Floating of Annuities Loan.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, May 31.—The Boerse closed the week with an inactive session and a depressed tendency. Further delay in the emission of the Young loan and the fact that Wall Street was closed for two days had an enervating effect.

Only Buderus of the mining group, Vogel and Deutsche Telephon of the low-voltage group and Ostwerke in the beer and spirits section were firmer. Bemberg among the artificial silks, Continental Gummi in the shipping stocks, chemicals and electrical issues, and shares of the potash group and Verkehsweisen were offered and weaker.

ALONG THE HIGHWAYS OF FINANCE.

Teagle's Preference for Work—A Century of Scale-Making—West Coast's Steel Plants—Domestic Statistics.

A Vacant Chairmanship.

Contrary to the policy of the Rockefeller interests, the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey has been for about a year without a chairman of its board of directors. The vacancy has remained unfilled because of the disinclination of Walter C. Teagle, president of the company, to take over the job. He has been urged, ever since the death of the former chairman, George H. Jones, as the logical man for the place, but the type of work involved makes little appeal to him. Mr. Teagle had the refusal of the chairmanship before it was offered to Mr. Jones, and he turned it down then because he preferred to continue as the company's operating head. It is now expected, however, that Mr. Teagle soon will accept the "promotion," giving up the arduous task of managing the company for the less strenuous chairmanship. James A. Moffett, a director and one of the ablest executives in the Standard of New Jersey, is almost certain to succeed Mr. Teagle in the presidency.

An Industrial Anniversary.

Fairbanks, Morse & Co. will celebrate at St. Johnsbury, Vt., on July 4, 5 and 6 the 100th anniversary of the modern weighing machine. The occasion will be observed also as the centenary of the scale-making business of this company, which is the outgrowth of an enterprise that was started in 1830 at St. Johnsbury by Thaddeus, Erastus and Joseph P. Fairbanks. Their original investment was $4,000. Today the Fairbanks, Morse Company does a business of about $35,000,000 annually, and besides scales it manufactures railroad equipment, electric motors, pumps, Diesel engines and other products.

United States Steel's Expansion.

James A. Farrell, president of the United States Steel Corporation, has been on the Pacific Coast for some time developing the expansion plans of the Columbia Steel Corporation, which United States Steel acquired last year. He has let it be known that a far-reaching program for the enlargement of the Pacific Coast properties is under consideration, but he told less than half of the full story. What the Steel Corporation is aiming for is a fully integrated steel unit of large capacity that will be the equal in efficiency of any of its other properties, not excepting that in Gary, Ind. The Steel Corporation originally invested the equivalent of about $50,000,000 in Columbia Steel, but it will spend more than that amount, it is understood, in enlarging and modernizing the properties of that company. Mr. Farrell is now working out the details. Columbia Steel is being developed largely with the view to adapting its properties to the furtherance of the Steel Corporation's business in the Far East.

A Record for Growth.

The Borden Company is approaching the completion of its expansion program, according to Wall Street information, and a check-up last week disclosed that the company has in the last two and a half years established a new high record for rapidity of growth. Between Jan. 1, 1928, and the present time Borden has taken over about 150 operating companies. In most instances the acquisitions were financed through an exchange of Borden stock, except for such cash as was required to retire bonds or preferred stocks of the companies taken over. Since the end of 1927, when the big expansion program was just getting under way, the company has nearly trebled its total assets. The company was established originally as a manufacturer of condensed milk, but it has greatly extended its operations, and now its business is divided into four main divisions—food products, fresh milk, cream, &c.; ice cream and butter and eggs. The company operates in about thirty-five States.

A New Financial Plan.

Something of a novelty in stock financing is provided by a new company known as Unit Service, Inc., which has undertaken to market securities under a plan calculated to reach the small investor. The new company is seeking to sell fractional shares of common stock of the Industrial Rayon Company. Each fraction is called a unit and the price is $22.40, representing roughly one-fifth of a share. The company, headed by Major B. Foster as president, has opened offices and begun operations, but little publicity has been given to its plans. An investor under the plan is not permitted to purchase more than two units a month.

An Electrical Nation.

The extent to which the people of the United States are dependent upon electricity is indicated by a report of the National Electric Light Association, which shows that at the beginning of 1930 there were, roughly, 18,000,000 electric flatirons in operation in this country, 8,720,000 electric cleaners, 7,420,000 electric toasters, 6,680,000 electric washers, 5,880,000 electric fans, 5,500,000 electric percolators, 3,200,000 electric space heaters, 3,000,000 electric sewing machines, 1,880,000 electric refrigerators, 880,000 electric ranges, 580,000 electric ironers, 500,000 electric oil burners and 75,000 electric dishwashers.

Dividend Rumors.

Responsible persons in Wall Street are extremely cautious in predicting possible dividend reductions, but recent developments in the copper industry have been such as to remove some of the restraint which otherwise would surround dividend discussions affecting companies in this field. Directors of the Kennecott Copper Company will meet for dividend action tomorrow and, whether or not the rate is to be reduced from the present annual basis of $5, the stock market has already discounted a downward readjustment. The same may be said of the Anaconda Copper Mining Company, whose directors are to meet in about two weeks for dividend action. The fact that Kennecott is selling at around $48 a share suggests that the present $5 rate is not generally regarded as a permanent basis and this is also true of Anaconda, which, although the present rate is $7 annually, is selling on the market at around $61 a share. The dividend meetings of these two companies are looked forward to with more interest than has attached to any other board meetings in recent months.

A Close Relationship.

Many in Wall Street have noted recently, with increasing surprise, the improvement in the relations between the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey and the Cities Service Company. A few years ago the two companies were as far apart as it was possible for two large companies operating in the same industry to be. The Standard of New Jersey, the keystone of the far-flung Rockefeller oil enterprises, had little in common with the comparatively new industrial and utility giant developed by Henry L. Doherty and associates. Now the two companies are partners in a number of large undertakings. Last week, for instance, it was announced that subsidiaries of the two had entered into a contract to develop jointly 400,000 acres of oil lands in Venezuela. This announcement came shortly after it became known that the Standard of New Jersey was joining with Cities Service and other companies in constructing a natural gas pipe line of 900 miles length from the mid-continent field to Chicago. The latter arrangement has been broadened so that the line will touch Detroit, Omaha, Minneapolis and St. Paul.

The World's Biggest Sign.

RCA Radiotron, Inc., a subsidiary of the Radio Corporation of America, has arranged to construct a procelain letter sign covering the largest area of any such sign in the world. It will also claim distinction for novelty effects. The sign will rest on top of the company's main offices in Harrison, N. J. By means of jumping notes on a clef, the sign will display as a theme song the opening bars of "Hail to the Chief." More than 4,000 lamps will be used in the illumination.

MAKING MONEY
by dealing in money

If you had enough capital to finance it, you might reasonably be tempted by the business of a well-managed Personal Finance office. Few other industries have grown so tremendously and paid such excellent returns in proportion to the investment. If there is one business that can be considered stable and necessary under most conditions, it is the business of dealing in money. Money is the essential commodity of modern civilization, hence a universal need.

With $550 or more invested in A.C.C.C. Profit Sharing Bonds, far-sighted men and women are using a thoroughly practical plan for participating in the profitable business of personal finance. By owning a single security, they not only receive the fine return of $30 per annum for every $550—but in addition participate directly in at least 25% of the earnings.

For guaranteed principal—better than average return—and a clean-cut opportunity to share in the rapid expansion of a fast-growing, prospering business, do as 12,000 other foresighted men and women of the NCCA family of security holders have done.

THE NCCA ORGANIZATION PLAN

Investigate the A. C. C. C.
6% Guaranteed Profit Sharing Bonds

THE BUSINESS

Holding a stock interest in personal finance companies, banks and other investigated industries. Founded March 1929, as outgrowth of successful National Cash Credit Association with assets of $30,131; closed first year with resources increased to $1,967,688.20.

Proceeds of bonds are to be used for enlarging portfolio and acquiring additional stock of banks and established personal finance companies. Only one-sixth of possible market has been tapped thus far, so that largest expansion lies directly ahead. Several tremendously important steps now being organized by the Corporation. Survey shows personal finance loans issued last year exceeded $1,000,000,000. Earnings of the corporation not dependent on business conditions in any particular area.

THE SECURITY

The 6% Guaranteed Profit Sharing Bonds are secured, both interest and principal, by the entire assets of the National Cash Credit Association which is the parent company of 13 subsidiary companies operating over 100 offices throughout the United States with total resources of over $13,000,000. Security ranks first.

6% Interest coupons payable on first days of February, May, August and November.

Profit-Sharing Bonus paid annually on February 1st to registered owner of bond, by check.

Issued in denominations of $500 and $1,000, and priced at $110 and accrued interest.

$35,348,000 BONDS CALLED FOR MAY

Redemptions Last Month Prior to Maturity Greater Than in April or March.

PUBLIC UTILITIES IN LEAD

Large Issues Are Announced for Retirement in June and Also at Later Dates.

More bonds were called for redemption in May before maturity than in the two previous months. The total for the month was $35,348,000, against $23,669,000 in April and $43,051,600 in May last year. Public utility and industrial issues accounted for the bulk of the redemptions, both groups being above the totals for April. State and municipal bonds called were slightly higher than in April, while foreign, railroad and miscellaneous issues fell below those of the previous month.

Included in the calls last month were the entire issues of Standard Milling Company 5 per cent gold notes, called at par for May 2, and Philadelphia Electric Company first lien and refunding 5½s, due in 1953, called at 107 for May 1. Smaller issues called were $1,513,000 Providence, Rhode Island, water refunding, sewer and highway bonds, for May 1 at 100, and $604,000 Holland-America Line sinking fund 6s, due in 1947, at par, for May 1.

In the following table comparisons are made of bonds called for redemption in May for three years:

	1930.	1929.	1928.
Industrial	$12,562	$21,254	$56,971
Public utility	17,175	9,057	114,116
State and municipal	1,908	296	444
Foreign	2,939	4,028	46,174
Railroad	124	1,879	29,930
Miscellaneous	640	6,537	7,367
Total	$35,348	$43,051	$255,002

Bonds already called for redemption in June aggregate $54,972,000, compared with $37,197,250 called for the full month of June, 1929, and with $91,283,250 two years ago. Among the large issues scheduled for retirement this month are $32,000,000 Kingdom of Belgium 7¼s, due in 1945, called at 115 for June 1; $4,300,000 American Linseed Company 6 per cent notes, due from 1931 to 1935, called at 100½ for June 15, and $6,153,000 Memphis Natural Gas Corporation first mortgage 6s, due in 1943, called at 103 for June 27.

Notices issued last week for bonds to be retired in future months included Republic of Chile sinking fund 6s, due in 1961, and 4½s dated 1889, aggregating more than $500,000, for July 1; East Bay Water Company first 5s, 5½s and 6s, for July 1 and Sept. 1; $700,000 State of Delaware 4½ per cent State highway loan of 1922, for July 1, and Hungarian Consolidated Municipal 7s of 1926 and 7½s of 1925, for July 1 at par.

For the five months ended with May bond redemptions aggregated $184,208,100, compared with $416,625,500 in 1929 and $1,146,587,382 in 1928 for the corresponding periods. The sharp drop in bond redemptions this year has been due in part to the decrease in high interest bearing issues outstanding, as compared with years prior to 1928. In that year the number retired was large and the volume exceeded $1,000,000,000. Money rates prevailing in 1928 were low and an important factor in refunding in that period. With the easing in charges for funds this year, a gradual increase in retirements has taken place in the last few months.

In accompanying tables compiled by THE NEW YORK TIMES, bonds and stocks called for redemption are listed.

this motion we do not wish to imply that a valuation should be made in the event an application is filed with the commission to transfer the properties of the aforementioned companies to applicant."

In regard to the acquisition of the properties of the various companies involved in the negotiations, the commission says:

"We are not making any findings at this time as to whether or not applicant should be permitted to acquire the properties of Great Western, San Joaquin, Midland Counties and their respective subsidiaries. It is expected that if applicant will acquire the control of said companies it will go forward with the consolidation of the properties and that, as it progresses with such consolidation, the necessary applications will from time to time be filed with the commission.

"It is apparent that many of the economies to which reference has been made can be put into effect prior to the complete merging of the properties and that the savings which so can be effected should, to a considerable extent at least, be transformed into lower rates. While witnesses for applicant did not commit themselves definitely on this matter, a reading of the petition and a study of the record clearly shows that the company commits itself to the policy that the public shall be benefited directly through the acquisition of the stock and the purchase of the properties of the companies mentioned. If for any reason applicant does not voluntarily reduce its rates because of savings which can be effected, the commission will take such steps as it deems proper and necessary."

NEW ENGLAND TONE BETTER.

Department Store and Specialty Shop Sales Encouraging.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, May 30.—While business reports continue mixed in the New England district, sentiment in industrial and banking circles seems to be somewhat better. Sales in department stores and specialty shops are fairly satisfactory and do not make a bad comparison with a year ago. There seems to be a little more snap, also, to the wholesale dry goods, men's furnishings, and women's cloaks and suits.

New building operations are much larger than earlier in the year, and lately have been making a favorable comparison with this period of 1929.

Curtailment is reported in most textile centres, both in cotton and woolen goods. The local wool market is strong, and makers of woolen cloth are looking forward to a considerable improvement in business for the second half year.

Most shoe factories are working on part time, as is usual at this season.

TO INCREASE PRODUCTION.

Several Chicago District Manufacturers Plan Expansion.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, May 30.—Department store sales of apparel were slowed this week by cool weather, but the demand for sporting goods and other holiday items was active.

Several manufacturing groups have stepped up production. A leading Chicago maker of radio sets will add 15,000 workers to its payrolls and that of its refrigerator subsidiary in the next sixty days. A manufacturer of piston rings and other motor and tractor accessories reports the best business in its history.

State savings deposits as of May 1 increased slightly over the preceding month.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago report, dealing chiefly with conditions in April and early May, revealed a further narrowing in the spread in activity between 1930 and 1929. Practically all lines of wholesale and retail trade showed gains over the preceding month, while automobile sales were 17.9 per cent higher in April than in March and only 19.3 per cent in number below the retail total of May, 1929. This is the smallest decline shown so far this year.

The Chicago building permits situation continues sharply adverse, the total for the first twenty-eight days of the month as computed by a contractors' association being $3,394,108, compared with $33,486,620 in the like period of May, 1929.

FACTORIES SHIP MORE GOODS.

Pennsylvania Expects Revival of Delaware Shipbuilding.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, May 30.—Shipments of goods by rail compare favorably with former periods and reflect a better condition of manufacturing generally in this State. To offset reduced earnings the Pennsylvania Railroad is putting many workers on furlough, subject to call when business increases.

Cement producers are active in the building lines. Paint and varnish factories are busy, but the demand for bricks and lumber continues slow.

The revival of shipbuilding on the Delaware will soon bring a demand for mechanics and materials. Chemical plants are doing well. Seasonal fabrics have a good market, but most textile plants continue only moderately active. While prices of rubber goods have changed but little, manufacturers report that business was not improved much since the first of the year.

In April industry used 2 per cent more power than in March and 5 per cent over last year. Hosiery production was lower. April order books increased 13 per cent.

IRON AND STEEL PICK UP.

Orders Booked for 300,000 Tons in Cleveland District.

Special to The New York Times.

CLEVELAND, May 30.—Iron and steel and particularly pipe mills at Youngstown and Pittsburgh are in an improved position through about 300,000 tons of orders recently booked. Bar, sheet and strip producers have reduced operations because of the lack of support usually furnished by the automotive industry at this time.

Prices continue weak with most lines, including pig iron, scrap and coke, tending lower. Tin plate is one of the few products which has not changed in the last six months.

Clothing manufacturers are making preparations for the Fall season, production getting under way about two weeks later than in 1928, or 1929, partly because of the late Easter. With the exception of the spurt in April, caused by replacement orders, business so far this year has been considerably below the last two years. Retail establishments have pursued a very hesitant buying attitude and are operating with reduced stocks generally.

Small manufacturing plants in the central part of the district have generally been operating at satisfactory levels for a period of recession. A few complaints regarding collections have been received but they are, in most cases, reported to be on a par with 1929.

SHOE TRADE SHOWS GAIN.

But Sales Generally in Richmond Area Are Irregular.

Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, Va., May 30.—Wholesale trade in the Fifth Federal Reserve District in April was spotty. Shoes and hardware showed gains over April, 1929, but groceries, dry goods and drugs were in smaller volume.

Grocery and hardware sales were better in April, however, than in March. Shoes alone show an increase for the four-month period, the gain being 12.6 per cent.

Stocks carried by wholesale firms decreased seasonally in April. Dry goods and hardware stocks at the end of the month were lower than at the end of April, 1929.

Collections during the month were somewhat better than in April, 1929. General business conditions are fair. Debits to individual accounts are only a shade under those for the corresponding week of last year, indicating a fair volume of retail trade.

Important construction contracts, including a $2,200,000 coal pier for the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway at Newport News, were awarded during the week.

DEPARTMENT STORE BANKRUPT

Southern Bankers Confer on Industrial Financing Plan.

Special to The New York Times.

ATLANTA, May 30.—A drawback to the advance of prosperity in this section this week was the announcement of a voluntary petition in bankruptcy filed by the Chamberlin, Johnson-Dubose Company and the appointment of a receiver. This large department store had been operating in Atlanta for more than sixty years.

An association was formed at a conference here this week to enable Southern industries, large or small, to obtain financing in the South. Cities represented included Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, Greensboro, Winston-Salem, Atlanta, Savannah, Jacksonville and New Orleans.

WHEAT OUTLOOK IMPROVES.

Kansas City Area No Longer Fears Terminal Congestion.

Special to The New York Times.

KANSAS CITY, May 30.—Ratification of the merger of the Fidelity National Bank and Fidelity Savings Bank with the Liberty National Bank this week gave Kansas City a new bank with capital in excess of $6,000,000 and deposits of around $60,000,000.

With the 1930 harvest only about five weeks away, the grain trade and railroads in this district are preparing for the handling of a combined crop of about 255,000,000 bushels for Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma and Texas.

Although storage stocks of wheat locally are about 19,000,000 bushels, it is generally expected that they will be reduced by July 1 to around 15,000,000 bushels, or about the same as a year ago. Capacity of local elevators will also be increased by that time to about 29,000,000 bushels.

Gold reserves of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank decreased $3,000,000 in the past week, offsetting an increase of $2,000,000 in the preceding week. The total is still $34,000,000 larger than a year ago.

DALLAS DISTRICT LOOKS UP.

Merchandising Improves, and Building Activity Is Brisk.

Special to The New York Times.

DALLAS, Texas, May 30.—Business in the Dallas district has shown some improvement, and a better undertone generally is shown by the monthly business review issued by the Eleventh Federal Reserve Bank here.

Merchandise distribution shows improvement, especially sales to and by department stores, where the volume of retail sales for the month have exceeded last month and also have been larger than for the corresponding month last year.

So far, this is the first time that sales this year have exceeded sales for the corresponding period of last year, and this is taken as a very hopeful sign.

Wholesale trade also is larger than for last month, but is not quite up to the figure for May, 1929. Commercial failures in this district during May were fewer than for the same period in 1929, but the aggregate of indebtedness was slightly larger.

Building continues active, improvement being noted with the return of favorable weather, and the unemployment situation is not serious.

NORTHWEST TRADE IS QUIET.

Minneapolis and St. Paul Show Increase Over Last Year.

Special to The New York Times.

MINNEAPOLIS, May 30.—The volume of business in the rural districts last month was slightly below last year, although in Minneapolis and St. Paul some increase is noted by the Reserve Bank.

All classes of freight are moving in smaller volume. Building contracts, flour production, shipments of linseed products, copper production, country lumber sales and wholesale trade are below last year.

Favorable reports have been made on the condition of small grains in the Northwest. The butter situation has shown further improvement.

The estimated cash income to farmers last month was about 29 per cent smaller than a year ago, with smaller wheat receipts at terminals and lower prices for products except potatoes.

ST. LOUIS BUSINESS LAGS.

Wholesale and Retail Trade Is Reported Only Fair.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. LOUIS, May 30.—Business conditons are not altogether satisfactory in this district. Gains are reported in some lines while others continue to lag.

Wholesale and retail trade is only fair. Shoe manufacturers say their trade does not equal 1929. There is still a considerable demand for novelty shoes.

Due to the season, there is an increased demand for hardware, especially garden tools.

Building is not progressing as expected, but will soon improve. City improvements are being pushed in order to care for the unemployed.

Steel and iron plants are operating on light schedules, but plants turning out electrical supplies are on full time.

The crop condition is reported as good.

CHANGE FOR BETTER NOTED.

Unexpected Rain Aids Pacific Coast Fruit Crops.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 30.—A slight change for the better was noted in general business on the Pacific Coast for the last week, although there has been a holiday cut in merchandise sales and a decided reduction in security dealings.

Nevertheless the tone when the market closed Thursday was excellent.

An unexpected rainstorm drenched the northern half of the coast, materially aiding agriculture and causing no damage to the ripening crops of cherries.

Natural gas companies are attracting most of the attention of investors.

GOLD MOVEMENTS SMALL LAST MONTH

Imports of Only $3,155,000 and Exports of $55,000 at This Port Recorded.

The movement of gold through the Port of New York in May was on a smaller scale than in previous months this year. Imports aggregated $3,155,000 and exports only $55,000, compared with imports of $40,523,100 and exports of $90,000 in April. In May, 1929, imports totaled $20,393,000 and exports $201,000. The only large shipment received last month came from Peru. It amounted to $2,433,000. Most of the balance also came from Latin America. A shipment of $5,000 to the Philippine Islands and $50,000 to Argentina constituted the exports. Earmarked gold was decreased by $4,000,000 in the month.

Shipments of gold from the Orient received at San Francisco in May were heavy, $2,700,000 coming from China and $11,102,000 from Japan. These imports, added to others received since Jan. 1, brought the total for the year to $113,183,000, of which $8,176,000 was received from China and $105,007,000 from Japan.

Gold received through the Port of New York in the five months ended on May 31 was in excess of exports by $65,133,100. This compared with $134,523,000 for the similar period of 1929. There also was a decrease of $18,001,000 in earmarked gold. Brazil sent $5[illegible],435,000, the largest amount received this year. France took $8,497,000, the largest exports for the year to date.

Gold shipments for May in the last three years compare as follows:

	Imports.	Exports.	Excess.
1930	$3,155,000	$55,000	$3,100,000
1929	20,393,000	201,000	20,192,000

If unable to answer that question and interested in equipping yourself with the necessary education for successful investment, you should enroll in the McNeel Institute course in Practical and Applied Stock Market Investment.

ELECTRICAL BUYING IS FAIR.

Equipment Bookings in East Continue to Lead in Volume.

Demand for electrical equipment and apparatus held at fairly steady levels in the principal market centres last week, according to Electrical World. Sales maintained a reasonably satisfactory volume.

Equipment bookings continued to show a better volume in the Eastern district, with central-station prospects giving promise of early commitments. Electric railway business reflected a revival of demand and industrial inquiries increased. Large equipment orders are spotty.

REACTION DESCRIBED AS 'MAJOR MOVEMENT'

London Bank Reviews World-Wide Causes of Present Trade Set-Back.

Discussing, in its monthly review, the financial and industrial reaction following the world-wide boom of the few preceding years, the Westminster Bank of London concludes that in the history of the past hundred and fifty years "similar epochs of economic progress have always been terminated, sooner or later, by reactions of greater or less severity. The hope, frequently expressed in America and elsewhere, that the greater degree of conscious 'control' exercised today by producers over production would eliminate, or at least 'flatten out,' this cyclic tendency, was last year put to a decisive test and failed to survive the ordeal.

"The first signs of an unfavorable change came from the primary producing countries. The difficulties of the rubber producers of Malaya, the tin producers of the Straits and Nigeria, the wool growers of Australia, the coffee producers of Brazil and the wheat growers of the United States, Canada and the Argentine—all these became perceptible, last year, while the activity of American (and European) industry remained apparently undiminished. The fall in commodity prices, however, could not long be disregarded as the first indication of a change in the world economic trend and its accentuation in the Autumn of last year—which made it impossible for even the most optimistic of observers to disregard its implications—synchronized with an abrupt break in world security prices and a slowing down in industrial activity.

"The conclusion reached by our survey is, therefore, that the present low level of money rates must be associated with a widespread depression in trade, signalized, in the first place, by a decline in the prices of foodstuffs and raw materials and, in the second, by a contraction in industrial activity. There is reason to regard this as a major cyclical movement and to expect the same sequence of events along the road to recovery as on similar occasions in the past, of which records are available.

"That the process will be considerably more speedy, however, than that which characterized its predecessor—the post-war slump—is distinctly probable. The ultimate cure must be provided by industry itself, in the shape of cheaper and enhanced production, but in the meantime cheap money must perform its indispensable function of tiding industry over a trying period. It may be reasonable to expect in 1931 a year of progressive economic recovery, with a moderate hardening of money rates. Further than this, however, it would be unwise to prophesy in May, 1930."

MAY WHEAT FALLS AS FUTURES GO UP

Unsettlement in Deliveries of Closing Month Has Effect on All Grains.

SUPPORT LACKING IN OATS

Spot Month Corn Rises 2½c and Deferred Deliveries ½c—Rye Dull and Higher.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, May 31.—Unsettlement in the May deliveries of grain had considerable influence on the deferred deliveries and kept traders on the anxious seat a good part of today. Wheat was strong early, but reacted later when liquidation by tired longs started in the May toward the last, and part of the early bulge was lost.

May finished ⅛ to ⅞ cent lower for the day. A house that usually acts for the government was the best buyer on the break, while another house was credited with having sold July as a hedge against purchases of May, the final spread being around 3 cents. Deferred deliveries finished ⅝ to ¼ cent higher. December leading.

All futures sold early at new highs on the present movement as the result of apprehension of damage to the Canadian crop and because of strength in Winnipeg and Liverpool. High winds in Alberta and Saskatchewan, with dust storms and rapid absorption of the moisture in the two Provinces, had considerable influence here, and in some sections drifting of the soil has set back the crop.

The forecast indicated scattered showers over the week-end.

Foreign Crop News Ignored.

Foreign crop news, which was little changed, was generally ignored as a market factor, although May 23 marks the average date of the completion of seeding in Siberia, which has 20 per cent of the Russian acreage. Liverpool closed ⅝ to ⅞ cent higher than on Thursday, due to strength in Winnipeg on Friday and on the unfavorable Canadian crop news, but Winnipeg failed to show the strength that characterized it Friday and gained 1½ to 1⅝ cents compared with Thursday.

A Winter wheat crop of 549,000,000 bushels was suggested by the E. H. Miller-J. E. Bennett report, compared with 525,000,000 estimated by the government on May 1 and with 578,000,000 bushels harvested last year. Spring wheat condition is placed at 86.9 per cent, against 84.8 a year ago and 86.8 last year.

Export demand at the seaboard was fair, with sales of 500,000 to 600,000 bushels in all positions. At Fort Worth, Texas, which received today its first car of new wheat of the season, reported harvesting of wheat and oats as fairly general in that territory.

Primary receipts were 683,000 bushels, a week ago 693,000 and a year ago 682,000. Shipments were respectively 361,000, 630,000 and 1,021,000 bushels.

May Corn Shook Up at Finish.

Buying of 10,000 bushels of May corn toward the last found nothing for sale and the price was bid up 2½ cents to fill the order, the finish being 2½ cents higher. Deferred deliveries were firmer early, but reacted and were only ¼ cent higher at the last. The Bennett report suggested an increase of 5 per cent in acreage.

Primary receipts of corn were 1,420,000 bushels; a week ago, 830,000 bushels, and a year ago 607,000. Shipments respectively were 756,000, 463,000 and 671,000 bushels.

Oats closed 4 to 4¼ cents lower for May, liquidation toward the last finding support limited. Cash houses bought early. Deferred features finished ¾ cent lower to 1⅛ cents higher, the former on July. Rains would be beneficial in parts of Illinois. Bennett's report made condition 84.4 per cent against 82 a year ago and 83.7 last year.

Rye was dull and ⅜ to ¾ cent higher, houses with Winnipeg connections being on the selling side.

Prices for the principal grains were as follows:

"Makers of Future Prosperity"

Every forward looking investor can profit by reading in the June 4th Financial World Mr. Frederick Hanssen's article with the above heading. This article is remarkable for its vision into the future. It portrays an extension of American prosperity through the development of new wants that will add to the welfare and happiness of the people. Mr. Hanssen points out some of the large new industries that should result from these progressive trends to higher living standards. He points out specific companies that are likely to profit materially from three great developments that appear reasonably near realization on a large scale and which will revolutionize various phases of our existence.

SOME competent analysts are not at all reluctant in labeling Radio Corporation an attractive purchase opportunity — because, as they assert, the Company has distinct possibilities of great future expansion.

Other market experts take a contrary view. According to these dissenters, the proposed action of the Federal Government to test the legality of Radio Corporation set-up may result in permanent injury to the company.

JOB FACING STORES SHOWN BY REPORT

E. A. Godley Cites Harvard Study as Pointing the Need of Expense Control.

POLICY PROBLEMS TO FORE

"Easy Come, Easy Go" Must Be Given Up—Holds Fancy Service Should Be Curtailed.

Retail executives during the week scrutinized the Harvard report on 1929 retail operations, making careful comparison of it with similar reports for previous years. The new report affords a critical index to the depth of the job currently facing the retailer, according to Edwin A. Godley, retail store consultant for S. D. Leidesdorf & Co., public accountants, chairman of the metropolitan group of the Controllers' Congress of the National Retail Dry Goods Association and co-author of "Control of Retail Store Operations," which has just been published.

The 1929 report, Mr. Godley pointed out, as was the case in preceding years, shows diminishing operating profits, before discounts and other income. This showing, he said, in the face of a merchandise profit, emphasizes what the rising expense segment is doing to the retail business.

Expenses Went Up.

Throughout all types and sizes of stores in 1929, he added, the merchandise profit did not go down. It remained constant or showed an increase, but expenses went up. The final profit, including other income, has also gone down, but not as much as operating profit, indicating that a somewhat extraordinary situation affected "other income." This probably, in Mr. Godley's opinion, reflects a greater income from investments or call loans, an income not likely to be duplicated this year. A compensating factor this year, he said, may be the lower cost of borrowing money.

"The real store analyst," Mr. Godley went on, "must absorb the Harvard figures and think of them in conjunction with other factors confronting the retail business. The increase in volume and in the amount of the individual transaction has had a steady upward trend over a period of years. These increases in recent years, however, have become less pronounced. This year indicates a temporary cessation of volume gains with a definite decrease in the amount of the individual transaction, accompanied by lower commodity prices.

"These factors present much greater difficulties than the figure problems based on the report. Retailers are facing policy problems and it is to them that attention has to be turned. Retailers have been viewing things from the outside, cheerfully confident that sales results would atone for lesser control of expense. Now conditions demand that they look internally and take steps to guard against any kind of over-investment, whether it be expansion, over-merchandising or over-servicing. The attitude of easy come, easy go must be abandoned. There must be fewer markdowns, improved buying, greater understanding of causes of customer returns and curtailment of fancy service.

"The crux of the matter is that common sense and steadfastness must replace outward show and internal carelessness. There is no adequate justification for such frills as afternoon teas, free distribution of cigarettes, store personnel turned into 'baby minders,' over-furnished executive offices and a host of similar practices which contribute heavily to expenses, but do nothing else.

Meaningless Advertising.

"Then there is so-called institutional advertising, flattering to the whim of the management, but more or less meaningless to the public. Many of the advertisements are out of line with the policies of the store and the clientele it aims to serve. Price warring on individual items lasts for a day in the minds of the public, but shows up for a long time in the merchandising profit of the department.

"In the application of common sense it may be well to give more thought to the effect upon the store's clientele of ostentation or bluff. Possibly it creates a negative reaction in the minds of the customers who have been in the habit of buying in the store, giving them the impression that the store is just above their pocketbook.

"Maybe such an attitude fails to leave the impression of economy, and economy is what industry and consumers are stressing today. Money is not being withheld from the purchasing of actual needs—there is no buyers' strike—but people are more than ever value-conscious in the spending of their dollars.

"In closing, it may be pointed out that thinking in terms of store savings it is not always necessary to look at big items. The department store is full of corners that can be efficiently cut. Contributions can come from the merchandise as well as the service divisions through more direct application of responsibility and fewer assistants to assistants, locating work where it belongs, eliminating fancy hobbies, &c.

"In considering the course of this year, the smart retailer will make a profit from a constant sales volume or even with a slightly lower volume."

MAY SALES GAINS LIMITED.

Some Stores Went Ahead; General Turnover Seen on 1929 Level.

While some stores are expected to show sales gains for the month which closed yesterday, views expressed by retail executives yesterday indicate that May turnover in the majority of instances will probably approximate that of a year ago. The month, it was pointed out, was roughly divided into two sharply contrasting periods. It began well, with consumer interest stimulated by a sharp rise in temperature, but cold and wet weather in many sections of the country during the last half served materially to lower previous gains.

A particular feature of the month, as contrasted with a year ago, was the drop in the dollar value of the unit transaction. While the percentage of the drop varied with the individual store, the decline was a general experience and accounted in no small way for the difficulties in obtaining volume increases. Merchandise prices eased in sympathy with lower commodity levels and consumer attention tended to be largely concentrated on medium and popular price merchandise.

The Merchant's Point of View

CONSIDERING the extra stimulant to sales which the holiday usually provides, retail trade for the week was not up to expectations. The pace set during the hot spell was not reached again during the month, though turn-over continued at a better rate than previously this year. From present indications, May retail sales failed to match those of the same month last year. Some sections may show a slight increase, but results for the country as a whole, if present reports are accurate, were spotty.

The four-week report of the largest mail-order-chain organization disclosed a loss of 6 per cent.

One of the leading chain systems, for most of the month, according to a statement issued during the week, enjoyed sales on a par with a year ago, but with almost 15 per cent more stores in operation. While extremes in temperature have undoubtedly affected sales this year, along with adverse business conditions, the month last year also yielded indifferent results.

Fewer buyers were in the merchandise markets last week, but mail orders on seasonal items continued to be received in good volume. While there is still a call for "specials" to be featured in retail sales this month and next, there is a growing interest in early Fall lines which manufacturers in various branches are now preparing. Price reductions are more frequent, though they seem to be occasioned more by lower prices on raw materials and increased competition than by the necessity of unloading surpluses. The latter, in fact, are conspicuous by their absence.

Forecasts Had to Be Revised. Confident assurances from government and other sources that the business situation would reach normal in the month just closed were well short of the mark and have, of course, been revised. As the dull period of Summer is now near at hand, the new forecasts postpone the improvement to the Fall.

These predictions have more chance of being fulfilled, but there are still some important handicaps to be overcome. Employment conditions, for one thing, have not made the improvement which was expected. Then might be mentioned the uncertainties connected with the crops and crop prices, developments in export trade and the progress in key industries. Purchasing power, in short, may be built up during this period of restricted buying and subnormal trade against freer exercise in the Fall, but there are still some major influences which will shape business then that are not definitely settled now.

The week's developments threw little light on the future trend. Steel operations eased off a little further, but they have been holding up better than the seasonal movement usually shows. The same can be said of automobile manufacture. Commodity prices are still easing, but appear to have reached a nearly stable level.

There are some evidences that business sentiment is more hopeful for next season and for the present is satisfied to let matters run their course, since not much can be done to improve them.

Tariff Favors Rejected. In the explosion of last-minute protests on the tariff bill, the views of some of our chief business leaders have attracted most attention, and properly so. It is, indeed, a remarkable development in our economic history to find industrial interests of such prominence lined up with economists, editors and other representatives of the more theoretical school of thought who see such peril in the ridiculous measure now on the verge of final action.

But deserving of special note though their statements receive less attention are the protests of smaller manufacturers in industries receiving rate boosts who would rather forego the doubtful benefits of these increases than jeopardize trade at home and abroad by having the present bill become law. A silk manufacturer, a hosiery producer and a shoe company, to cite a few such instances, have seen the new tariff legislation in its proper light. What advantage is there to them in higher duties, they argue, if the general effect will be to curtail business and reduce purchasing power both here and abroad?

These reactions to tariff favors must come as a distinct shock to the high protectionist ranks. They can see some selfish reasons back of the opposition of those industrialists who have a world-wide trade to preserve, but it is difficult to answer the criticism of those who are expected to gain so much from higher rates.

The fact is, however, that traditional tariff views, based on selfishness and greed, are in distinct process of going the way of the narrow outlook on wages. Today a manufacturer hesitates to shut down his plant and cut wages because he realizes the effect on purchasing power. He has the broader economic welfare of the country in mind. A similar attitude with respect to the tariff is gradually coming about.

Leadership Was Lacking. Had President Hoover recognized this new viewpoint, as progressive business elements had every good reason to hope he would, there might have been a much better bill prepared and not the universal dissatisfaction and fear which rule today. The progressive group in business would have had a leader and, instead of this being the last high protection bill, as is freely predicted, it might have been the first legislation of a new order.

It is Mr. Hoover's idea, so his spokesmen say, to take the tariff out of politics. One can only wonder how this is to be accomplished by approving the present measure with its lack of courage, leadership and principle throughout. Each way the rates and the administrative provisions swung, with few exceptions, appeared to receive approval from the administration until the sorry results gratify very few and arouse many well-grounded fears.

In contrast to the bill for which approval is assumed, an honest beginning might have been made on a new program of tariff legislation much better calculated to further our economic progress. Even without the slightest vestige of leadership from the White House, the new era of tariff thought has been launched, and whether the present obnoxious proposals are approved or not, it is more than likely that a new program will make satisfactory headway.

Umbrella Comes Down. Action of the largest bituminous coal producer in abondoning its two-year effort to stabilize conditions in its industry by holding up wages and closing unprofitable mines is unfortunately a decision which other large manufacturers may also be considering. "The umbrella is coming down," the company announced, and wages will be reduced from 12 to 14 per cent. This marks an effort to cope with irresponsible producers who have cut prices and operated on lower wage scales.

The president of this company remarked, however, that, while it must yield to the inexorable logic of facts, it was not yielding to its convictions. "As it has been the last to follow into this dreary path," he said, "so it will cheerfully be among the first to abandon it."

The sympathy of all progressive management is attracted at first to that statement, but full appreciation depends on whether complete measures were undertaken to meet the problem. If the competition was merely one of "dog eat dog," as it so often is, then this company may be praised for its effort to elevate conditions, but it cannot be commended for striving through research to improve its processes, find new markets and increase its service. After all, there are organizations in the so-called "depressed industries" which have prospered in spite of competition that uses cut prices, un-American wages and even child labor.

In this particular concern the largest money interest in the country is reputed a large stockholder. The philanthropy of this family is world-famous, and it might properly be asked what service to humanity would rank higher than tackling this universal problem of holding up and improving wages (and consumption) so that production might enjoy the market it requires. After all, this seems to be the basic work for any broad welfare program, since it would deal with the cause and not the effects.

BUYERS IN MARKET OFF BUT MAIL ORDERS HOLD

Stores Push Promotion Plans for Month—Producers Busy on Fall Lines.

Although the number of buyers personally in the market declined during the week, the volume of mail orders for Summer merchandise continued substantial, according to the résumé especially prepared for THE TIMES of the market report of Felix Lilienthal & Co., Inc. Retailers, the report says, are carrying forward the promotional plans for this month. New and attractive merchandise is being sought, with stocks in the wholesale markets in healthy condition.

"Dress manufacturers," the report continues, "are concentrating their efforts on Fall lines. Very little new merchandise, therefore, is to be found. Printed chiffon dresses are available, although in pastel shades. In knitted dresses, boucles continue to be the outstanding items, the most popular combination being the three-piece suit. Warmer weather has again stimulated the demand for cotton dresses. In $10.50 lines, although the market is flooded with sheer goods in printed and plain chiffons, a demand has sprung up all over the country for printed crêpe numbers.

"The fabrics as well as the silhouette of the travel coats being shown are new and add emphasis to the femininity of the garment. The modified leg-o'-mutton sleeve, the large bell cuff of either self-material or fur, as well as the elaborate bolster or shawl collar in fur and semi-fitted bodies, all reflect the tendency toward a more formal type of sports garment. The waistline is back to normal and in most cases a belt is used to emphasize the waist.

"Most fur houses are now ready with their first showings of Fall coats. Prices are lower on most all furs with the exception of raccoons, which are about the same price, although the garments are longer. The major trends are: Coats are longer, are slightly fitted or straightline and are shown with and without belts. The collars are convertible, being designed to be worn up as well as down over the shoulders.

"Millinery manufacturers are working on rough straws, shantungs, stitched crêpes and angoras. Some of the better grade producers are working on transparent velvet ribbon berets and tams, and also crêpe and velvet combinations which will be shown for early Summer wear.

Mastick Bill Statement Soon.

An interpretative statement of the provisions of the Mastick bill regulating the hours of employment of female personnel in retail stores throughout the State will be issued on Tuesday or Wednesday, it was announced yesterday by Miss Frances Perkins, State Industrial Commissioner.

A RATIONAL POLICY FOR FOREIGN TRADE

Mr. Fitzpatrick Says Problem McKinley Posed in 1901 Has Arrived.

BUYING POWER ABROAD EBBS

Our Loans Not Enough to Support Our Exports—Trade Stand Needed to Promote Exchange.

The adoption of a rational policy for international trade is more than a required Spring tonic for our industrial situation, it is a prime necessity for national health, Paul Fitzpatrick, vice president of Bush Service Corporation and authority on international credits, stated in an interview yesterday. The economic difficulties which President McKinley in 1901 warned the nation would grow out of an attempt to maintain a position as seller exclusively of goods to the world, Mr. Fitzpatrick added, have now arrived.

"They are the result of ignoring the oldest economic law—that of barter and exchange—which has been tested and proved since the first merchants swapped a haunch of venison for a clay pot and the pot for a bearskin plus a fish hook."

The complete alteration of America's economic structure since the beginning of the twentieth century, Mr. Fitzpatrick continued, has made foreign markets one of the controlling factors in national prosperity. These markets, in his opinion, are now unavailable under the old conditions and only the fact that foreign buyers held in 1929 a small surplus of dollars remaining over as excess credit from past extensions insured continuation of the foreign trade movement to the degree enjoyed last year.

Domestic Market Overtaken.

"As mass production methods have increased and both the American birth rate and immigration have dropped in recent years," he continued, "industry in many lines has commenced to overtake its domestic market. Surpluses have developed or plant facilities have expanded to a point were surpluses would accumulate unless production was restrained. Even the comparatively backward agricultural section of our national machine has been able to increase output with reduced labor.

"Trade statistics show that finished manufactured products now comprise a substantial half of our entire foreign sales. Machinery shipments aggregating over $600,000,000 and automobiles and accessories with over $500,000,000 alone are half again as much as the total favorable trade balance of less than $800,000,000.

"Turn to the financial postings. How has our commerce been financed and what has changed the essential situation?

"Between 1919-1928 inclusive, American exports totaled over $53,000,000,000. Imports totaled $39,000,000,000, or a surplus favorable to exports of $14,000,000,000. In the same period, however, we extended many billions in credits to foreign countries through purchase of foreign securities, repurchase of American securities held abroad and by loans to governments and individuals. Also, from 1920 to 1927, we received in gold shipments (as part payment for exports) a surplus of $1,522,000,000 over exported bullion.

Surplus Continued Trade.

"This excess credit represented largely by borrowings over and above requirements for service upon indebtedness, gave the world a surplus in dollars which insured continuation of the foreign trade movement up to 1929.

"American lendings will continue to provide some elasticity, but there is a limit of capacity to the American investment market's ability to absorb foreign securities and this phase of support to export trade must be supplemented by the payment of American dollars for foreign products.

"It is necessary now to provide the soundest possible machinery for international trade," he continued. "The missing ingredient at present is a trade policy frankly designed to protect American standards, but also, and with equal frankness, designed to help bring world standards up to the American, by affording the other peoples of the world a readier means for exchanging their products for our own.

"Adoption of such a policy will be no unselfish step. Every phase of American business is insolubly bound to the development of foreign trade."

REPORT LITTLE CHANGE IN EMPLOYMENT HERE

Agency Heads Cite Small Gains for April and May Since February Low.

Employment conditions for all types of skilled and unskilled workers showed slight improvement during the last month, according to the heads of large employment agencies in this city. Although all report slight gains during April and May, the increase has been much smaller than was anticipated, it was stated.

Figures on the number of applications for office work as compared with the number of places available are not complete as yet, said James E. Gray, chairman of the committee on cooperation and better business of the New York Association of Commercial Employment Agencies, but in his opinion they will show little variation from April, when 1,000 men applied for every 100 jobs available and 695 women applicants were reported for every 100 positions. Last year the number of male applicants for each 100 positions was 243 and the number of female applicants 172.

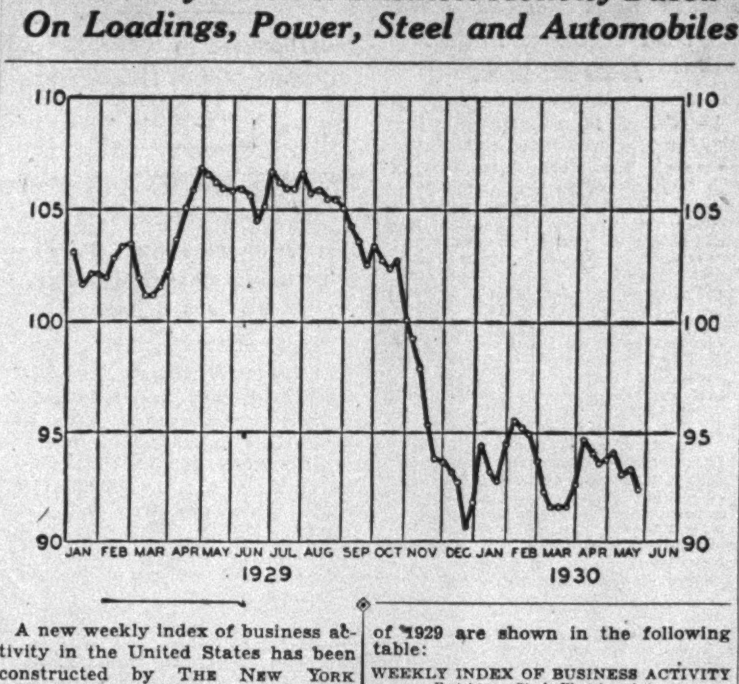
"Conditions have shown a slow but steady improvement since February of this year, which was the low point in the employment situation," Mr. Gray continued. "In February there were 1,416 male and 782 female applicants for each 100 available places. In March the figures dropped to 1,287 and 730, and by April they had been reduced to 1,000 men and 695 women, respectively.

"We believe that conditions will show a fair improvement during the coming months and probably reach normal in October."

In the field of skilled workers in building trades and factories the situation is still far from normal, an executive of an employment agency catering to this type of help reported.

At the Salvation Army employment offices, where many unskilled workers apply for assistance, officials said they had noted no improvement last month.

New Weekly Index of Business Activity Based On Loadings, Power, Steel and Automobiles



A new weekly index of business activity in the United States has been constructed by THE NEW YORK TIMES, the first charting of which is shown above.

Until recently about the only series of weekly data which would be valuable for the purpose of constructing a weekly index of business activity has been the familiar freight car loadings series. But within the last year and a half there have become available weekly figures on activity in three other industries which, on account of their basic importance, reflect with great accuracy the ups and downs which have characterized the course of American business activity over the last half century.

These series are electric power production, the rate of operations in the steel industry and automobile production; and these, together with the series on freight car loadings, constitute the basis for this new index of business activity.

The four series of data which have been included in THE TIMES index are those which would have to be given preponderant weight in any scientifically constructed business index, even if a much larger number of reliable series of data were included.

What the Series Represent.

The freight car loadings series represents the movement of all commodities shipped on all Class I railroads in the United States. Electric power production represents the output of electricity by all public utility plants in the country, and therefore the amount of power consumed by all classes of users, from the largest mines and factories to the smallest domestic consumer. The rate of operations in the steel industry represents steel ingot production, the monthly figures for which have long been considered one of the most reliable trade indicators in existence. And finally, automobile production represents the activity in an industry which in recent years has come into rising prominence as a key industry; as to its influence on general trade conditions there can scarcely be any question.

The four series enumerated are not the only ones which might be included in a weekly index of business activity but others have been excluded because for one reason or another they appear to be less useful or reliable as units in such an index.

In combining the four series selected into a composite index, the heaviest weight has naturally been given to car loadings, as that series is beyond question the most important and most reliable single business indicator that there is. Electric power and steel rank next, with equal weights. The least weight has been given to automobile production because, in contradistinction to car loadings and power, it represents activity in a single, though important, industry.

Before being weighted and combined into a composite index, however, each of the four series has been adjusted for seasonal variation, long-time trend and for variations in cyclical amplitudes.

The Weights Assigned.

The following table gives the weights assigned each series in the composite. The effective weight as given in the first column of the table is the weight actually assigned to each series. The adjusted weight shown in the second column is the figure actually used in multiplying, so that the varying widths of the swings in each series will not destroy the desired weight relationships.

SERIES IN THE INDEX AND THEIR WEIGHTS.

	Effective.	Adjusted.
Freight car loadings	35	40
Electric power production	25	48
Steel production	25	9
Automobile production	15	3

The accompanying chart shows the course of the combined index back to the beginning of 1929, the earliest date for which the combined index figures have been computed.

Complete data on the combined index and on each of the adjusted component indexes back to the beginning of 1929 are shown in the following table:

*Subject to revision.

As shown by the chart, there has been a further decline in the combined index following a slight upturn in the week ended May 17. For the week ended May 24 the preliminary index stands at 92.4, the lowest point reached since the week ended March 22.

Loadings and Power Declined.

The drop in the combined index was brought about by sharp declines in the adjusted indexes of freight car loadings and electric power production which more than offset moderate gains in the adjusted indexes of steel ingot production and automobile production. The adjusted index of freight car loadings for last week is based on an estimate and is subject to revision.

Despite the downward tendency shown by the combined index for the last seven weeks, an encouraging aspect of the situation is that the rate of operations in the steel industry over this period has held generally steady despite the usual seasonal decline which normally sets in the first week in April and lasts until about the Fourth of July. This is significant because steel ingot production is peculiarly sensitive to changes in basic industrial activity in the sense that at important turning points it not infrequently moves somewhat in advance of other trade indicators. This is probably true at present on account of the well-known fact that at no time has steel production been more closely adjusted to actual demand than it is just now.

Like the rate of operations in the steel industry, the advance in the weekly adjusted index of automobile production has been brought about by a steady rate of output in defiance of the usual downward seasonal tendency; and the fact that for the most part this maintenance of output has been in the low-priced passenger car field does not detract in the least from whatever significance or beneficial effects it is having for business generally.

FLORIST USES VOLUME PLAN

Local Dealer Fixes Small Mark-Up to Meet Competition.

Application of the volume sales principle, permitting smaller mark-ups, has now been successfully applied for the first time to the retailing of flowers, according to Jack Trepel, local florist. By setting and achieving a volume mark of a million dollars annually, he said yesterday, it has been found possible to offer competition to the most exclusive florists and at the same time meet the competition of small retailers. This is done, he added, by daily purchases in the wholesale flower markets of large quantities of those flowers experience has shown will be in demand.

"For example," Mr. Trepel continued, "where the small dealer buys from the orchid growers, through commission houses, fifty orchids at $2.50 each, which must be retailed at $5 or $6, the large dealer who buys 500 of these blossoms can afford to sell them at $3, because his quantity order permits him to buy them at $2. The larger retailer can dispose of from 10,000 to 20,000 roses a day, as against 500 for the small dealer."

Roses, Mr. Trepel finds, are the best year-round sellers, having about 50 per cent of the retail demand. Orchids have forged steadily forward. Gardenias lead in corsage flowers. Violets have been declining in favor, as have carnations, of which only limited stocks are now carried.

WHOLESALE ORDERS FELL.

Credit Index Shows Drop From Previous Week—Equals Year Ago.

Orders in the wholesale merchandise markets here last week fell below those of the previous week, but equaled the figures for the corresponding week last year, according to the report based on inquiries received by the Credit Clearing House. With the average weekly inquiries on merchandise orders in the wholesale market during 1927 taken as 100, the index of the Clearing House last week stood at 65. This compares with 75 in the preceding week and 65 for the corresponding week last year.

The average order for the week just ended was $281, compared with $252 for the week previous. Changes in recommendation last week were 33 per cent greater than those of the corresponding week in 1929. Overbuys for the week continued normal.

FEELS PRICE SLUMP HAS NEARLY ENDED

Purchasing Official Holds Sale of Commodities Below Cost Is Indication.

BUYERS FOR STABILITY

Realize That Business Cannot Gain With Shrinking Values—Belief in Lower Wages Abroad.

The fact that many basic commodities are now selling at prices below their costs of production is regarded by George A. Renard, secretary and treasurer of the National Association of Purchasing Agents, as a clear indication that the steady declines which have marked the recent movement are now near an end. This is proved, he pointed out, by the fact that many of the commodities are now fluctuating within a very narrow margin, indicating that further severe declines are unlikely.

The subject of commodity prices has been given close study by special committees of the purchasing group for several months, he said, and at the forthcoming convention of the association in Chicago June 16 to 19 their reports will be the main topics of discussion. All angles of the question are to be considered because of the important bearing which commodity prices have on the general health of business.

Buyers Just as Much Interested.

"The problem of declining prices is as serious a subject as business has ever faced," he continued, "and the buyer is just as much interested in stabilizing business on a profitable basis as other factors. Industry will have great difficulty in improving in the face of shrinking inventory values.

"The buyer's viewpoint is entitled to serious consideration, since the consumer types of manufacturing organizations, such as automotive, construction utility, &c., which he represents have formed the basis for the prosperity of the producing types, such as steel, copper, textile, rubber, &c., over the past few years.

"At present both are faced with a heavy over-production or over-capacity. The former can only be cured by lowering prices to eliminate the high cost producer or through mergers, which accomplish the same end. The only remedy lies in reducing production or increasing consumption by lowering prices.

"Commodity prices have been forced to give way under the circumstances but not all are dangerously low. In fact, the most severe declines are noted only in basic commodities.

Pre-War Levels Reached.

"Of these basic commodities, those which we import, such as coffee, rice, rubber, silk, tin, &c., are at the same or lower levels than they were before the war, while no such condition exists, as a rule, among the commodities produced or manufactured in this country. This aspect of the situation presents a more serious international problem than most people realize. Since we are now the great creditor nation and debts are paid in commodities, a lower level of price increases these debts, as it increases the amount of materials that must be produced to pay them. This is one of the reasons why European economists do not agree with our theory that high wage levels can be maintained. They claim that neither here nor elsewhere can wages be kept up in the face of continually declining prices.

"However, with prospects of an end to the decline, the situation begins to look brighter. Many are beginning to take advantage of the fact that prices are at or near bottom and to a speculator the commodities are probably more attractive now than the stock market."

TARIFF CHANGES.

Germany Raises Rates on Rye and Fodder—Increased Duty on Shoes in Nicaragua.

The following is a résumé of the weekly changes in foreign tariffs, prepared for THE TIMES by the local office of the Department of Commerce:

The German duty on rye has been increased from 9 to 15 reichsmarks per 100 kilos and on fodder from 10 to 12 reichsmarks. Effective today the import duty on unpolished (brown) rice is reduced from 2.50 to 1.50 reichsmarks per 100 kilos when the shipments come from treaty countries. The United States is on a treaty basis with Germany.

Nicaraguan duties on leather shoes have been increased by one-half and those on wicker furniture by one-fourth. After June 15, the import duties on raw materials for the manufacture of footwear, or rubber heels and soles, and on brocades, fabrics and buttons for footwear are reduced by one-third. Modern machinery for the manufacture of footwear will be admitted free of duty. Raw materials for the manufacture of wicker furniture are accorded a reduction of one-fourth of the former duties.

The Austrian Government proposes to increase in the near future the import duties on numerous agricultural and industrial articles, notably cotton yarns and fabrics, iron sheets, veneers, aluminum, starch, wheat and flour. Establishment of the final rates, however, is dependent upon the present treaty negotiations with Hungary and Yugoslavia.

The Norwegian Department of Agriculture has decided to maintain its regulation prohibiting the importation of muskrats. Sweden, likewise, continues to bar such importations.

By terms of a French decree Guadeloupe now imposes a duty of 2 per cent ad valorem on importations of nitrogenous fertilizers, which formerly were admitted free of duty. A tax of 2 per cent ad valorem is also imposed on manufactured organic fertilizers which were previously taxed at 1.28 francs per 100 gross kilos.

Pending the negotiation of a commercial treaty, a temporary agreement has been concluded between the United States and Egypt. It is understood that the agreement grants unconditional most-favored-nation treatment, with certain reservations, and that it may be denounced upon 90 days' notice.

Firms in New York and vicinity desiring detailed information regarding these changes may obtain it from the local office of the Department of Commerce, 734 Custom House.

RUG ORDERS TO BE LIMITED.

Market Looks for Smaller Response Than Usual at Opening.

Floor coverings mills in opening their Fall lines tomorrow face the prospect of a smaller volume of purchasing than they have experienced on such an occasion in some time. Mill executives admit that they expect orders to be limited, but believe that conditions will improve as soon as general business shows a more substantial gain. Although a certain amount of "jockeying" for price concessions is looked for at the opening, it is predicted that no reductions will be made excepting in velvet and tapestry rugs, where some easing in prices may be noted.

An executive of one of the leading mills admitted yesterday that "we cannot look for a great deal of business."

"However, we are resigned to the situation," he continued, "and, like other mills, are marking time and keeping stocks at a low point, believing that limited buying is a natural reflection of business conditions. By the time the next opening comes, in December, business will be fully recovered and we anticipate that the floor coverings industry as well as others will be back on a more normal footing."

REVIEW OF WEEK IN REALTY MARKET

Steady Improvement Reported in Metropolitan Suburban Communities.

NEW BUILDINGS PLANNED

Several Large Apartment Houses Are Projected as Result of Recent Transactions.

Realty conditions in and around the metropolitan area, despite the week-end holiday, showed well-sustained activity during the past week. Marked improvement is being reported in practically all sections of the suburban market.

Evidences that prices are holding up well when large plots are offered at public sale was given when $375,950 was realized at the sale of 209 lots by James R. Murphy in the Forest Hills West area of Queens. Another interesting realty item from that borough, which has doubled its population during the last ten years, was the announcement that additional medium-priced flats are about to be constructed in the Sunnyside Gardens section of Long Island City, where the City Housing Corporation erected the first residential buildings for workers with moderate incomes about six years ago. The projected operation is to be undertaken by the Society of Phipps Houses, which purchased a site from the City Housing Corporation, 400 by 460 feet, for immediate improvement.

Many New Building Projects.

The number of new building projects announced during the week was seen as another encouraging feature. In the old downtown insurance locality, where the assemblage of large plots has gone on rapidly, two new twenty-eight-story buildings are soon to be erected by Samuel Friedenberg on the large parcel he has rounded out on the easterly Gold Street block front between Platt and John Streets. The Gold Street frontage, lately acquired by the old marine insurance firm of Chubb & Son, was sold to Mr. Friedenberg, and in the building planned to be completed there next May the Chubb concern has leased four floors for a long term.

In the upper Fifth Avenue locality workmen began demolishing the large Haggin house erected by the late George Crocker at the north corner of Sixty-fourth Street. The property was recently purchased by Anthony Campagna and plans were filed during the week by Cross & Cross, architects, for a fourteen-story apartment house which is to be added to the large cooperative house which is nearing completion by the Campagna interests on the remainder of the block front with the exception of the Sixty-fifth Street corner. When completed, this new building is to be one of the largest structures of its kind on Fifth Avenue.

West side activity was reflected in the purchase by Henry Kaufman from Frederick Brown of the south corner of Central Park West and Ninety-second Street, 100 by 265 feet, now occupied by the ten-story Ardsley Towers and other buildings. The site is to be improved at once with a twenty-story apartment house, which is to be another imposing addition to the large number of modern residential buildings that are rapidly replacing the earlier type of apartments. Frederick Brown also resold during the week the twelve-story Bonta-Narragansett Hotel, at the southeast corner of Broadway and Ninety-fourth Street.

Another Sale by Brown.

Another important transaction in which Mr. Brown figured was the sale to Abner Distillator, builder, of a large plot at the southeast corner of Third Avenue and Sixteenth Street, 103 by 100 feet, near Stuyvesant Square. The buyer plans to erect a twenty-story apartment house. This area, including lower Second Avenue south of Fourteenth Street, is experiencing a rebuilding movement in tall apartment structures somewhat similar to the radical upper east side changes between Fifty-seventh and Ninetieth Streets.

In West Forty-second Street the reported purchase by the McGraw-Hill Publishing Company of the plot at 326-346 West Forty-second Street, running through to 327-345 West Forty-first Street, from John A. Larkin and associates was not only of interest as marking a forthcoming operation for a new home for the McGraw publishing concern, but it also definitely set at rest the oft-reported rumor of a 110-story building on the site. The new McGraw edifice will be, it is reported, from sixteen to twenty stories high. For fifteen years the Mc-Graw-Hill concern has occupied the large building at 469-75 Tenth Avenue, corner of Thirty-sixth Street. The site in Forty-second Street is between Eighth and Ninth Avenues.

TO OPEN NURSES' UNIT SOON

St. Mark's Hospital's First New Building Is Nearly Ready.

The new $500,000 nurses' home at 226 East Twelfth Street will be opened formally about the middle of this month as the first important unit in the $5,000,000 reconstruction program of St. Mark's Hospital, Philip G. Gossler, president of the institution, announced yesterday.

Funds are now being raised for the proposed new main hospital building, a ten-story structure for the northwest corner of Second Avenue and Eleventh Street.

McADOO SHARES $64,790.

He and Associates Get Judgment in Florida Real Estate Case.

TAMPA, Fla., May 31 (AP).—William G. McAdoo, former Secretary of the Treasury, obtains a share in a judgment for $64,790 against Owen Burns, Sarasota real estate developer, by a Federal court decision here. Several associates of the ex-Secretary participated.

Joseph Rinock, former Kentucky Representative, filed the suit, alleging that Burns and his friends were to furnish $50,000 to buy land in Sarasota known as the "Sugar Bowl." The McAdoo interests put up a like amount, but the Burns money was not forthcoming and it was contended that Burns did not return the money to Mr. McAdoo and his associates.

The court directed that a judgment of $50,000 and interest be awarded.

$5,500,000 ADVANCED ON HOUSING IN CHELSEA

Straus Bond Issue Covers London Terrace Apartments Being Built by Mandel Corporation.

The 23-24 Corporation, Henry Mandel, president, has obtained a $5,500,000 loan for the completion of twelve apartment houses under construction in London Terrace, in the Chelsea section, it was announced yesterday by S. W. Straus & Co., the lenders. The loan is in the form of a first and general mortgage fee 6 per cent sinking fund bond issue, maturing May 1, 1940. It covers the block bounded by West Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Streets and Ninth and Tenth Avenues. The land, owned in fee by the London Terrace Corporation, has been leased to the borrowing corporation.

The mortgage is a first lien on the east and west portions of the block, covering frontages of 197 feet 6 inches on Ninth and Tenth Avenues, with depths of 125 feet on both streets. It also constitutes a lien upon the five interior parcels, each of which has a frontage of 110 feet on both streets, subject only in the case of each of the five parcels to a $1,100,000 first mortgage.

The ground area of the land covered by the mortgage is about 158,000 square feet. The block, with proposed improvements, when completed, has been appraised by Kenneth Slawson Hobbs, Inc., Walter Stabler, consultant, at $16,525,000.

THE NEW TARIFF: MEANING TO THE CONSUMER

The Finished Bill Is Assailed From the Democratic Side as Sheer Exploitation And Defended by Its Author in the House as an Equitable Revision

AFTER fourteen months of almost continuous session, Congress will soon cease its labors and offer to the country for approval and to the President for signature another tariff bill.

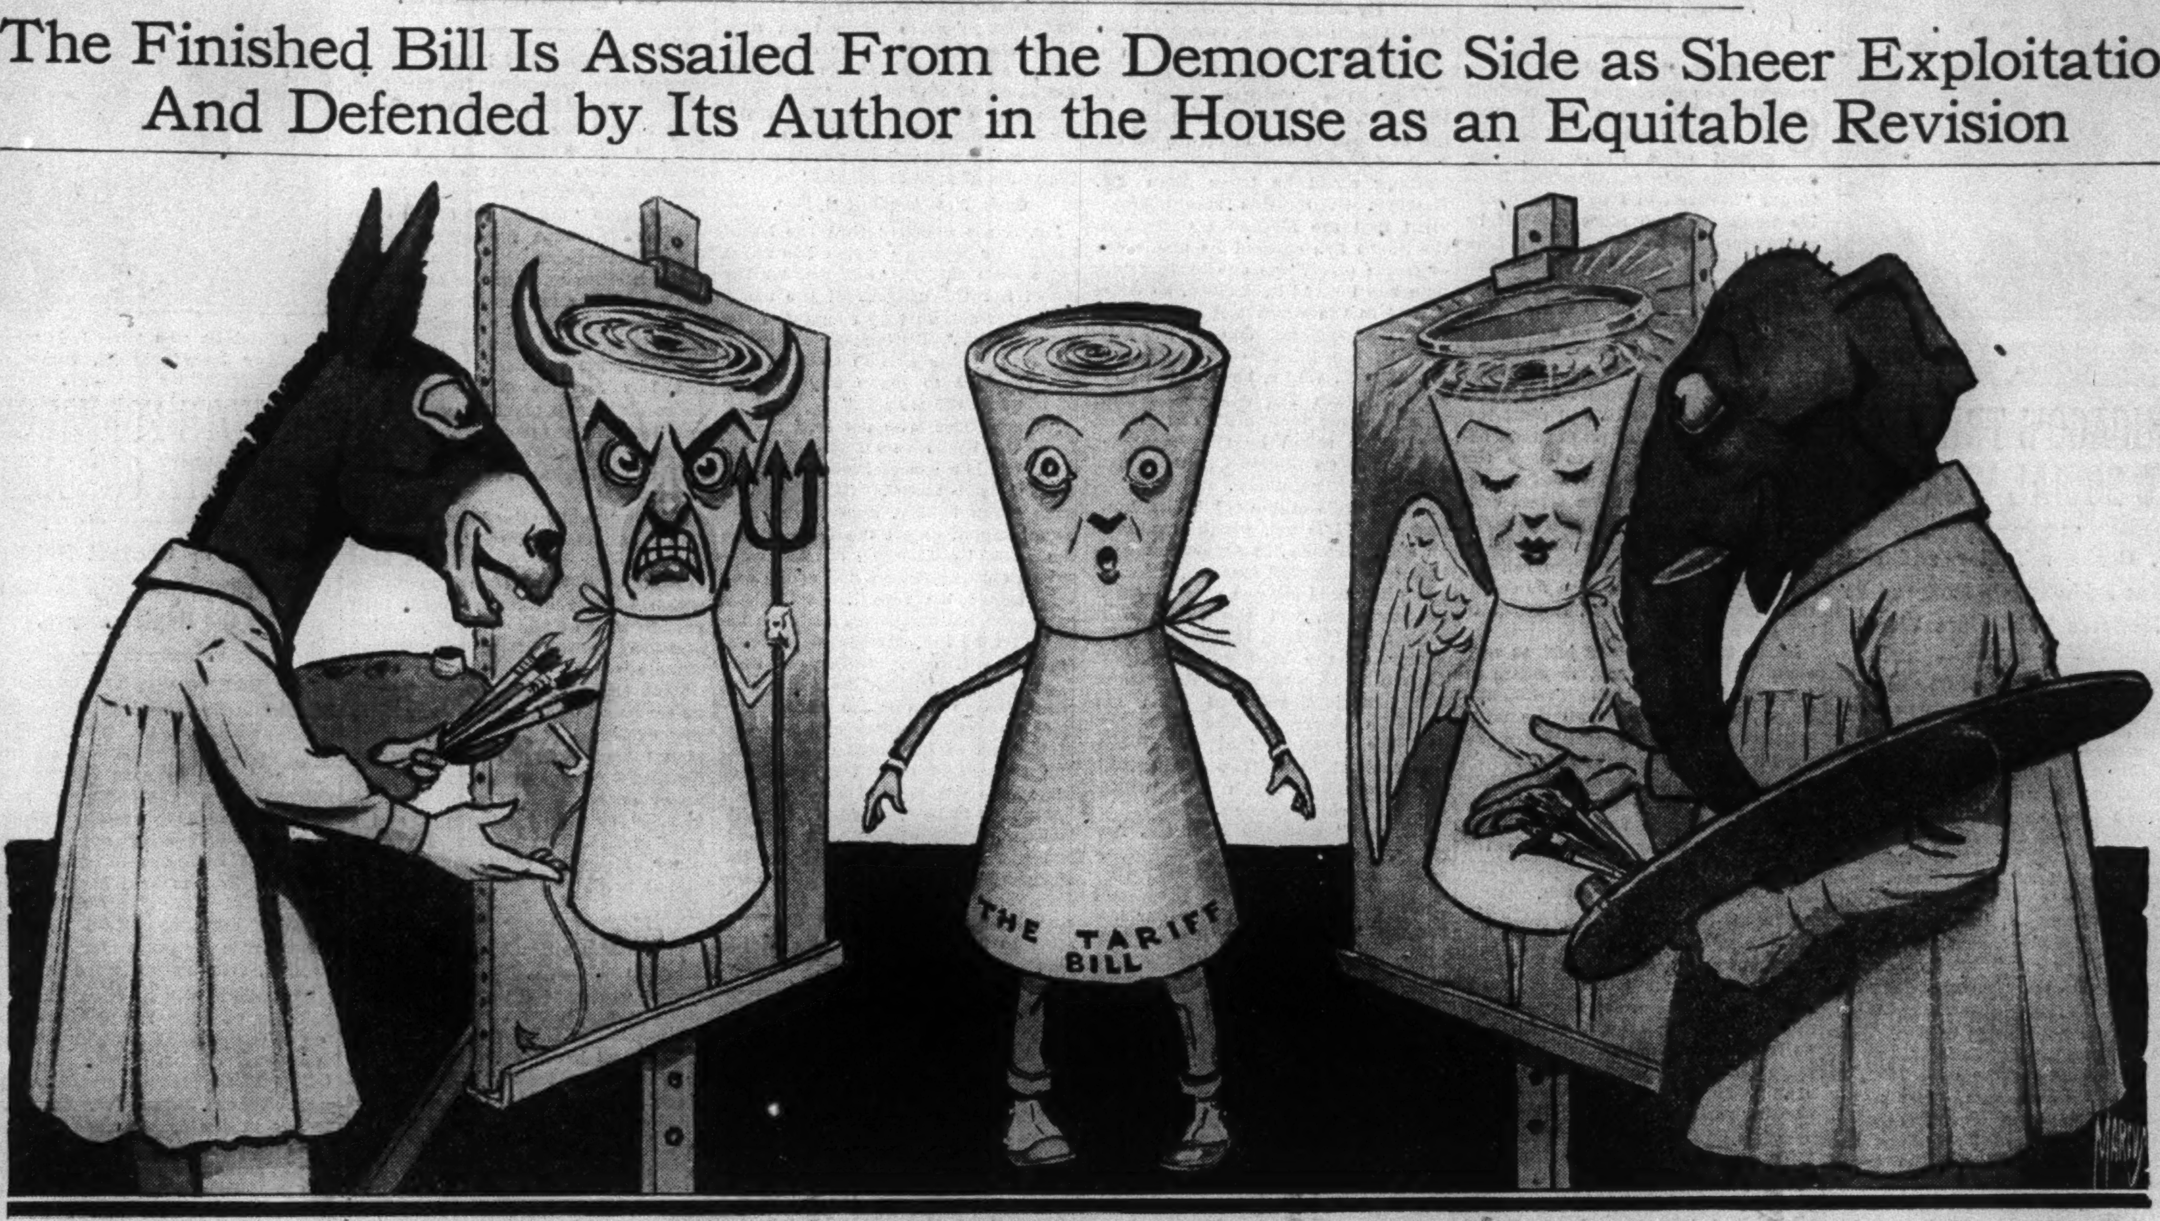
As the tariff has been assembled schedule by schedule and rate by rate, it has been impossible to survey the bill as a whole. The most pressing topics of the moment were such questions as sugar schedules, wool tariffs, lobbying practices and the like. But now that House and Senate conferees approach an agreement the tariff may be examined in its full significance.

What does the new tariff mean to the consumer—to the man in the street? The question is discussed on this page by its sponsor and by its principal opponent in the House of Representatives, where the tariff bill originated.

The bill is attacked by Representative John N. Garner of Texas, minority leader of the House and ranking Democratic member of the Ways and Means Committee. Says Mr. Garner: "No greater fraud was ever perpetrated upon the American people than the claim of proponents of the Hawley-Smoot bill that it is designed 'to protect American labor,' a statement which the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee had the audacity to insert in the title of the bill. Its real purpose is to exploit, not to protect."

A contrasting view of the tariff is that of one of its makers, Representative Willis C. Hawley of Oregon, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. "The pending bill," he says, "gives due concern to the nation's wage-earners. Twenty-seven million of our people earn their daily living by being on some payroll, who with their families comprise more than half of our population. To the extent of their use, foreign-made articles which supplant in our markets articles that can be properly made here deprive our own workers of labor and wages."

Mr. Garner's indictment and Mr. Hawley's defense of the tariff follow:



THE PORTRAIT PAINTERS.

AGAINST THE TARIFF

By JOHN N. GARNER.

STRIKING direct at the workingman, the farmer and the small business man—the real foundation upon which American progress and prosperity has been established—the Hawley-Smoot tariff places an unjust and unnecessary burden of hundreds of millions of dollars annually upon those already overburdened by the gradual development of a tariff system which extends special favors to the few at the expense of the masses.

No greater fraud was ever perpetrated upon the American people than the claim of proponents of the Hawley-Smoot bill that it is designed "to protect American labor," a statement which the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee had the audacity to insert in the title of the bill. Its real purpose is to exploit, not to protect, and the millions of American working men, as well as the farmers and business men, are the targets against whom these shafts of tariff exploitation are aimed.

It is extremely unfortunate that the average individual does not have the time or the information at hand to ascertain with any degree of accuracy how he will be affected personally. An excessive tariff can be classified as an intangible tax which reverts to the protected interests instead of the government. The formulation of a tariff bill has developed into a wild scramble on the part of many selfish interests to secure the assent of Congress to the imposition of indefensible burdens upon the consumers. The consumer has no definite knowledge of how hard he is hit by this intangible tax. He cannot ascertain the production costs on the articles he buys, nor the cost of distribution. In a vague way he knows that the costs of the necessaries of life are constantly mounting; that the already swollen fortunes of those favored by excessive tariff rates are expanding; but he pays the extortionate prices created by these indefensible rates and merely utters ineffectual protests against the system which has placed an intangible and unreasonable tax upon practically every necessity of life.

Almost every article the average American citizen wears, eats or uses in his daily routine carries the tariff tax. Awake or asleep, he is constantly adding to the profits of those interests which are granted a special dispensation through the tariff to exploit him.

A Full Day of Taxes.

Take the average American workingman as an example. When he arises in the morning he shaves himself with a razor carrying a 117 per cent tariff tax, using soap that has a rate of 30 per cent. He dons his underwear, which, if cotton, is taxed 45 per cent; if wool, 55 per cent, and 73 per cent if he has aristocratic tastes and wears undergarments of rayon. He puts on his shirt, taxed 37½ per cent if made of cotton; draws on his rayon hose, on which he is assessed 73.34 per cent, and proceeds to don his light wool suit, taxed 67 per cent. He next pulls on his shoes, taxed 20 per cent, and, his toilet completed, he wipes his nose on a handkerchief which has a tariff rate of 40 per cent, and then hurries to the dining room for breakfast.

The morning meal, like all other meals, is a tariff nightmare. The buckwheat in the cakes is taxed 14 per cent. He spreads them with butter, which carries a tariff rate of 38.84 per cent, and gives them a liberal application of maple syrup, taxed 41.28 per cent. The bacon is taxed 9.16 per cent, and sugar 2 cents. Coffee is the only item on the menu that does not carry a tariff tax.

The wife is busy filling that "full dinner pail," taxed 45 per cent, while he dons his cheap overcoat, taxed 86.31 per cent, and his wool hat, taxed 203 per cent. If he can afford the higher grade of wool hat he is taxed only 111 per cent, or if he wears a straw the manufacturer thereof has a tariff rate of 159 per cent to "protect" his product. While waiting for his wife to bring the dinner pail he fills his pipe, taxed 423 per cent, and after a glance at the clock, taxed 91.83 per cent, hurries off to his daily toil.

If he is a mechanic every tool and practically every piece of material he may use carries an excessive tariff rate. If he is a clerk or accountant, his pens, pencils, paper, typewriter, ink, paper clips and every other article he may use has had its price enhanced by the tariff. If he is an executive, he sits down at a desk, taxed 40 per cent, smokes a cigar, the wrapper of which is taxed $2.92 per pound, and gives his orders to the tariff-harried office force, each of whom is probably contemplating asking for a salary increase in order to meet the ever-increasing cost of the necessities of life.

When the noon whistle blows the workingman seizes his dinner pail and proceeds to regale himself with roast beef, taxed 25.73 per cent; a couple of boiled eggs, 34.44 per cent; cold potatoes, taxed 52 per cent, and finishes with a bottle of milk which carries a 37 per cent tariff rate. This menu may be varied from day to day, but there is little variation in the tariff burden the working man is compelled to carry.

In the meantime his wife has had a busy morning and has done her bit toward maintaining the prosperity of the tariff barons. After preparing breakfast on the gas range, taxed 40 per cent, she decides to add to the menu some oatmeal, which still carries the old tariff rate of 8.16 per cent. With this she places on the table a small pitcher of cream, taxed 34.75 per cent, and then awakens the children. After giving them a bath in the enameled tub, taxed 48 per cent, she admonishes them not to forget to clean their teeth with brushes taxed 73 per cent to 101 per cent and hurries them into their tariff-taxed clothing and down to their simple but highly taxed breakfast. A few minutes later the children hear the school bell, taxed 40 per cent, and, taking their pens, taxed 43.26 per cent; pencils, 45.11 per cent, and paper, 29.24 per cent, depart to spend the day studying books printed on tariff-taxed paper.

Tariff in the Home.

Their mother sweeps the home with a broom taxed 25 per cent, scrubs the linoleum, taxed 42 per cent, with a brush taxed 50 per cent, using soap, all the components of which carry tariff rates. Completing this duty, she washes some of the necessary clothing for the children, using a tub taxed 40 per cent, hanging the garments on a clothesline, taxed 42 per cent, with clothespins that carry a tariff of 121.31 per cent. Completing this work, she brushes her feet on a cocoa fiber door mat, taxed 78.76 per cent, and hurries into the house to continue her daily routine.

She sews some buttons, taxed 358 per cent, on her daughter's dress, and then concludes to go down to market. Discarding her cotton house dress, taxed 54 per cent, she proceeds to comb her hair, using a comb taxed 60.26 per cent. She applies face cream and a little rouge, each taxed 75 per cent, and the powder applied to her nose is also taxed 75 per cent. She dons her woolen street dress, taxed 105.53 per cent, her hat, taxed 203.09 per cent, and taking her umbrella, taxed 60 per cent, and shopping bag, taxed 35 per cent, waits for the street car on the concrete step, the cement of which is taxed 16.86 per cent.

Arriving at the market she purchases such of the tariff-taxed necessities of life as her slim purse will permit, and, as she has a little time before lunch, decides to "shop" among the stores.

She needs an electric iron, but learns that the price has gone up, due to the 124 per cent tariff tax. She decides to buy an imitation pearl necklace for her daughter but finds that through the act of Congress the manufacturers of such articles have secured tariff rates which have boosted the prices. She also learns that the good five-cent cigar her husband formerly enjoyed in the evening after work hours can no longer be procured at that price due to the high rate placed upon wrapper tobacco, and concludes that he must content himself with the pipe on which the tariff has already been paid.

Even Toys Are Taxed.

The children return from school and seek to amuse themselves with their toys, taxed 70 per cent. Little Johnny adds to the profits of the textile manufacturers by ruining his trousers, necessitating a new pair, taxed at 56.36 per cent. His older brother dons his wool sweater, taxed 105.43 per cent, takes his steel fishing rod and reel, taxed 55 per cent, and goes down to the river confident he can catch a fish upon which he will not be compelled to pay a tariff tax.

When the father returns in the evening, dinner is served on a table taxed 40 per cent, the family sitting on chairs that carry the same tariff rate. The chinaware, if decorated, is taxed 81.06 per cent, if not decorated only 76.76 per cent. The silverware is taxed 65 per cent, and practically every article of food on the table carries a tariff rate.

After dinner father draws on his overalls, taxed 37½ per cent, digs in the garden with a spade, taxed 30 per cent. Willie cuts the lawn and trims the hedges, both the lawnmower and sickle carrying tariff rates of 30 per cent.

In the house mother clears up the dinner dishes and daughter sweeps the dining room rug, taxed 60 per cent. Finally the family repair to the living room, turn on the electric light bulbs, taxed 20 per cent, and listen to "Amos and Andy" over a radio, taxed 40 per cent. Later they retire to their beds, taxed 45 per cent, draw over them blankets, taxed 103 per cent, and, after settling their heads comfortably on feather pillows, taxed 20 per cent, compose themselves to slumber and forgetfulness of the burdens which the tariff barons, with the acquiescence of Congress, have placed upon them.

Apparently there is no escape from this tariff burden. After the American consumer has spent his days trying to extract from life a fair measure of its joys, and each hour of the day and night contributing to the profits of those special interests which have been successful in securing indefensible tariff favors, even death does not free him from their pitiless greed. His family is compelled to pay a tariff tax on practically every article that goes into the manufacture of his coffin, and when his body is finally laid to rest the granite tombstone with which they mark his resting place will carry a tariff rate ranging from 60 per cent to 1,500 per cent.

FOR THE TARIFF

By WILLIS C. HAWLEY.

THE present tariff law became effective on Sept. 22, 1922. When it was passed the world had not returned to normal conditions in production and industry, in trade and commerce. During the past eight years important new developments in manufacture and production have occurred, new competitors have entered the field, new price levels have been established and intensive drives have been made by old and new competitors upon our agricultural and industrial activities. A protective tariff is intended as an alert guard protecting our industries and labor against unfair competition, improper trade practices and exclusion from an advantageous participation in our markets, which markets our people have created and maintain.

Aims to Aid Labor.

It is the purpose of our protective tariff policy to make our country self-sufficient and self-sustaining; to afford our agriculture, industry and labor a proper opportunity in the American market. Under this system we have multiplied our national wealth, developed our resources, maintained a high standard of living and afforded our wage earners an unprecedented remuneration for their toil. It has made this a land of opportunity for brains, industry and ability of every kind. Our population is rapidly increasing. It is necessary to develop commensurately to meet our growing needs. Every branch of human activity is called upon to expand to provide for our people.

A nation that has the opportunities we have that does not provide conditions, so far as law can do so, for the employment of its people, fails greatly in its duty toward them.

The pending bill gives due consideration to the nation's wage earners. Twenty-seven million of our people earn their daily living by being on some payroll who with their families comprise more than half of our population. To the extent of their use, foreign made articles which supplant in our markets articles that can properly be made here deprive our own workers of labor and wages consequent thereto.

The pending bill is a readjustment of existing rates; it chiefly relates to agriculture and to industries for which the present law does not adequately provide. It is frankly a protective tariff bill framed to meet the legitimate needs of our day. It is intended to be a structure under whose protection all America will prosper.

Whenever a Republican tariff has replaced a Democratic tariff our imports have increased. The annual average imports under the Wilson act were $760,000,000, but were increased to $998,000,000 under the Dingley act. Under the Underwood act the annual average was $2,871,000,000, but under the Fordney act it has been $4,052,000,000.

That is, better protection to American products and labor has largely increased the prosperity and well-being of our people and at the same time materially increased the foreign trade. There is every reason to believe that history is ready to repeat itself and that the pending bill, when enacted into law, will not only benefit our own people but enlarge our foreign trade.

Will the readjustments in the pending bill benefit or burden the consumer? There is no exclusively consumer class in this country except those who render no service or produce no products. All others are both producers and consumers. The prime necessity for any producer, if he is to continue, is a profitable market sufficient to absorb the output. The wage earners, of all kinds, are our largest consumers by number, but they are producers as well. If conditions arise in which their services are no longer required or the employment is discontinued, they are the first to be affected. What they want is a job. Unemployment for a very short time will many times offset any increase that may occur when the pending bill becomes a law. Nor is there any occupation to which this will not apply.

Duty and Price.

In my opinion, based upon the past history of protective tariffs, prices will vary with supply and demand, under our competitive system, and the condition of the markets will be a primary factor in determining rise or decline in prices. A tariff duty is only one factor in determining the price at which an article will sell. There is no historical or economic basis for the wild statements that the duties proposed will cost the purchasers great sums. These are issued by those desiring to prejudice the bill in the public mind, having no regard for economic facts.

The proper test is made by offsetting any additional cost against benefits derived. Such a test taken over a period of time will show advantage on the side of benefits. If space afforded, it would be easy to multiply examples to show the accuracy of this observation.

A duty is not necessarily added to the price. Protection is intended to establish and maintain industries in this country, induce mass production and afford them a market. Profits usually accrue not from limited but from mass production. Tin plate and aluminum wares are good

WEEK-END CABLES: VIEWS OF EUROPE

Effect of Mussolini's Speeches Shows Weakness Of the Continent's Political Fabric

By P. J. PHILIP.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, May 28.—This fragile Europe has been experiencing some rude shocks in the past week. Only ten days ago Aristide Briand, filled with naïve faith in that settlement of the frontiers of the twenty-seven countries of the Continent which was made at Versailles eleven years ago, launched his appeal for federation. And within these ten days shots have been fired on the Polish-German frontier, and from beyond the Alps the voice of Mussolini has come thundering, declaring that Italy cannot be satisfied with what was given her at the great distribution of 1919.

There is no use in denying that the uneasiness which many have felt for a long time about Europe's stability on a peace treaty basis is beginning to prove founded. Though in France the Duce's provocative speeches were received with commendable calm, yet they admittedly sent a tremor through the whole fabric of the Continent. Words, he declared, are fine things, but machine guns and airplanes and ships are finer. There were approving shouts of "A basso el Francia!" If any other man in any other country had dared as much, there would have been a row at once. But here Italy is always considered as a separate thing from the Fascist party and its leader, and with Italy France has no quarrel and will seek none, even when she is under the rule of a Fascist mob.

Ministers Start Traveling.

Yet something had to be done about it, and there was a notable number of French Ministers who went suddenly traveling. Jacques Dumesnil, Minister of the Navy, went off to Algeria and Tunis, where he held a review of the fleet and made a thorough inspection of the defensive state of the country. Andrew Maginot, Minister of War, after consultation with Marshal Petain and General Weygand at Nice, crossed the Mediterranean to take stock of the military situation there. Senator Rollin, Minister of Shipping, went off to visit Corsica, which Italy has always looked on with covetous eyes since it definitely became French. It lies so much nearer the Italian coast.

Lastly Louis Loucheur, who, though no longer a Minister, remains close to M. Briand, went suddenly on a tour of investigation of Central Europe and dropped in on Belgrade and Bucharest.

Of course the week was not without its items of false news to add to the excitement. Two thousand Italians were reported to have landed in Albania. It was not true. There was no need for its truth. Albania is already sufficiently, in diplomatic phrase, under Italy's protection not to need more troops—at least for the present.

France Involved Anyway.

What was disturbing in the whole of the movements set up by the Fascist leader's old-fashioned speeches was immediate evidence of how nearly the whole Continent would be involved when once a break occurred. And such are France's commitments that whoever moves she is bound to be engaged. For ten years she has been sitting on a rather unsteady pinnacle of power in Europe, trying first by alliances, then by ententes, then by pacts and through the League and now by federation to strengthen her position from below and avoid a challenge. None know better than her own statesmen that if their country is to preserve its position peacefully there must be agreement, acceptance and federation. M. Briand is in a hurry for it. He knows the urgent need. Since America first and then England practically withdrew from the task of maintaining the map of Europe as it has been established at Versailles, France has felt insecure—not insecure for herself but insecure for the system and divisions of countries which, whether she liked it or not, was one of the only tangible things that came out of victory.

This week has shown how easily even a breath from a powerful pair of lungs can set it all trembling. It is far from being an encouraging outlook.

Next week Parliament reopens for a short session of six weeks with much to do and apparently very little intention of doing it. Premier Tardieu will start the ball on Sunday with a big speech at Dijon in which he will outline his program. Probably everybody will approve, for M. Tardieu's program is not political. It is practical, like the man himself. That, however, will not by any means assure him a constant majority. It may be a just cause of provoking attacks on his Cabinet.

THE WATCH-TOWER: VIEWS OF AMERICA

The Census in the Corn Belt Shows That the Trend to the Cities Is Increasing

By ROLAND M. JONES.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES.

OMAHA, Neb., May 27.—The Corn Belt is keeping one eye on its freshly planted fields and the other on the census reports. The new crop and returns from the recent count of noses are sprouting together. From a preliminary survey, with a great deal of the ground still bare or showing only the faintest of green and a great many supervisors still checking the work of their enumerators, the corn crop looks rather better than the census returns.

The corn, as a matter of fact, is off to an auspicious start. An abundance of Spring precipitation has stored a reservoir of moisture in the soil which will be available for a considerable period of growth. The rains and some unseasonably cold weather have delayed planting and germination somewhat, but not sufficiently to create an abnormal condition. After a few days of sunshine the difference will hardly be discernible.

The condition of the population presents quite a different situation. It is what market reporters call "spotty," with the good spots represented by the urban districts and the thinning spots in the rural districts. According to partial local reports thus far released, the cities and larger towns generally are shown to be making good although not phenomenal gains. In the smaller villages and country precincts growth has been greatly retarded, population is at a standstill or there is an actual loss.

Trend Began Before 1910.

It is evident that the population movement from the farm to the city has been continuing in the Corn Belt in the past twenty years without abatement. It will not be surprising, when complete returns are in, to discover that it has been accelerated.

Iowa's loss of rural population began in the decade between 1900 and 1910 and continued in the following decade. In those twenty years the decline in rural population was more than 130,000. Reports from 759 villages and 1,287 townships show a net additional loss of more than 25,000 so far in the present census. Ten years ago the urban population had reached 36.4 per cent of the total. It will not be surprising if it goes above 40 per cent this year. And this is one of the greatest agricultural States in the Union, the one which produces the most corn and hogs, the leader in agricultural wealth.

Discussion of this situation brings out two different points of view. Some look at it with dismay, as representative of an unhealthy condition of agriculture. Others are quite calm about it, regarding the loss as the natural and inevitable consequence of the invention of labor-saving farm machinery and asserting that we should thank our lucky stars the industrial communities can absorb this surplus coming out of the country and put it to work. The optimist points out that the land does not need the labor and releases it to be used where it is needed. The pessimist deplores the fact that the land cannot support directly so many people as it formerly did.

Farms Are Consolidating.

Side by side with reports of decreased farm population are reports of fewer farms. This is apparently not explained by abandoned acreage but by consolidation into larger farming units. This is made possible by the greater use of labor-saving machinery, and the use of such machinery, in turn, renders it desirable to farm as much land as possible with it in order to get the greatest return from the investment. Perhaps the 59,000 tractors in Iowa, the 52,000 in Kansas, the 32,000 in Nebraska and the 27,000 in each of the two Dakotas will explain something of what has become of the farm laborer, for the country depopulation is caused by the hired man who has sought urban fields of employment quite as much as by the old folk who have gone out to California or the boys and girls seeking careers in the big city.

The paradox is that, while farm population is ceasing to grow or is actually declining, farm life may be and often is infinitely more attractive than it ever was before. With the automobile, surfaced highways and the radio it has ceased to be isolated; the farmer need not work so hard nor so long and he may have most if not all the conveniences the city man enjoys, or excellent substitutes for them. The inference is that they are leaving, not because of a dislike for the old farm, but because it does not need them any more and cannot produce the income to go all the way around.

VIEWS OF AMERICA AS REPORTED FROM WATCH-TOWERS OF THE TIMES

NEW YORK'S POLICY ON INDIAN RIGHTS

Attempt to Bring the Red Men Within the Laws Bears on Lands and Legislation.

By M. M. WILNER.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

BUFFALO, May 29.—It is a fact which few appreciate until they encounter it, that the law of eminent domain in New York State does not apply against Indians. When a white man buys land he finds, if he examines his deed closely, that the State is the original source of his title. Because the State granted or permitted the first private ownership the State may reclaim the land when needed for a public purpose, and such purpose may be a corporate as well as a State enterprise.

The Indians, however, do not derive title from the State. On the contrary, the State derives title from the Indians. That point may be somewhat debatable with regard to the eastern counties, which the Dutch settled and the British acquired by conquest. Certainly, since New York has been governed under its independent Constitution, it exhibits a clear and unbroken succession of treaties by which all the central and western portions of its territory have been transferred from the Indians to the State or its agents. Although this region actually was invaded and conquered by an American army during the Revolution, when the Indians were fighting on the British side, no claim ever has been made to an acquisition by conquest. The land was bought and paid for. The prices really were not disproportionate to the value of a remote wilderness. The Indians still receive annuities under the terms accepted by their ancestors.

In those Revolutionary days the State, despite the hostile attitude of the Indians, was so insistent on their right to the land that it forbade any direct acquisition from them by white settlers and invalidated all such transfers as already had been made. That was done by incorporating in the Constitution of 1777 a provision that "no purchases or contracts for the sale of lands made since the 14th day of October, 1775, or which may hereafter be made with or of the said Indians, within the limits of this State, shall be binding on the said Indians, or deemed valid, unless made under the authority and with the consent of the Legislature of this State." That clause has been retained with slight changes in the succeeding Constitutions since 1777, and it still is embodied in the Constitution of 1894.

Indian Lands Today.

The conclusion necessarily has followed from the distinct recognition of an actual prior land ownership by the Indians that the State cannot recover by eminent domain any lands still owned by the Indians. The reservations have not been granted to the Indians by the State, as the lands held by white men have been conveyed. The areas now retained by the Indians are tracts which the State never acquired, so far, at least, as Indian title is concerned. If the State, or any corporate or individual agent authorized by it, wishes to gain possession of additional portions of Indian reservations, it must negotiate for them and obtain the consent of the aboriginal proprietors as it did in the eighteenth century.

This point is fundamental to the entire Indian problem in New York, and it has become pertinent to present times through persistent efforts to change the legal status of the Indians. Attorney General Hamilton Ward has expressed the opinion that, in order to place the Indians on an equal footing with whites in matters of education, health preservation, public improvements and other conditions of modern living, the State must have the same jurisdiction over Indians that it has over its citizens generally. The crying need for improvement along the lines which he indicates has been emphasized by recent investigations by Federal and State officials as well as by individuals.

Snell Bill Pigeonholed.

On the other hand, the Snell bill introduced in the House of Representatives at Washington, which the State Attorney General and the Federal Indian Bureau both favor, apparently has been driven into a pigeonhole by the assaults of Indian spokesmen and their friends. The bill provides that the laws of the United States shall not be deemed to forbid the exercise by the State of the same jurisdiction and power over Indians that it holds "over the persons and properties of other citizens."

Obviously this would permit the State not only to tax Indian lands but to take them by eminent domain. The fact that the city of Syracuse needs a portion of the Onondaga reservation for a public improvement is assumed to be the motive of the proposed legislation. The State undoubtedly would gain a great advantage by this extension of its authority. But what would the Indians get out of it? They and their friends quite logically contend that the aboriginal lords of the soil would have to take the same chances as now with the Legislature in seeking appropriations for education, health conservation, &c., while they would be giving up the security which they now have in the possession, at least, of places to live.

The Indian is dependent absolutely on the white man's sense of justice. It has become, therefore, peculiarly an obligation of conscientious white people not only to insist on a full and generous recognition of the rights of Indians but to seek a definite understanding of the nature of their rights.

CHICAGO'S TRIBUTE TO SOCIAL WORKERS

Dr. Graham Taylor and Miss Jane Addams Are Honored as Pioneers in Welfare Work.

By S. J. DUNCAN-CLARK.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

CHICAGO, May 27.—Hull House, most famous of social settlements in Chicago, if not in the United States, celebrated the other day its fortieth anniversary. This interesting event, and the almost simultaneous appearance of "Pioneering on Social Frontiers," by Graham Taylor, founder and head resident of Chicago Commons, has directed the thoughts of many people to the part played in the city's life by the settlements and their leaders.

The settlement movement in America had its beginnings in New York and Chicago in the late '80s, inspired by the opening of Toynbee Hall, in London. Stanton Coit, after a period of residence in the London institution, launched in New York the Neighborhood Guild, on the lower east side, which has since come to be known as University Settlement. About the same time Miss Jane Addams and Miss Ellen Gates Starr took over the fine old residence of Charles Hull at Polk and Halsted Streets, Chicago, and began a work of neighborly helpfulness which has commanded the interest and admiration of humanitarian leaders throughout the world.

Chicago Commons came into being five years later when Graham Taylor and a little group of fellow-adventurers on the social frontier established themselves in a rented house at Union Street and Milwaukee Avenue.

First Course in Sociology.

Dr. Taylor had come to Chicago from Hartford, Conn., in 1893—the year of the World's Fair—to "pioneer the first department of instruction in any church institution to be wholly devoted to the social interpretation and application of religion." He was summoned to this task by Chicago Theological Seminary. He notes that he began his labors at the seminary in the same month in which Professor Albion W. Small established at the new University of Chicago the first department of sociology to be included in the curriculum of an institution of higher learning. In accepting the professorship at the seminary Dr. Taylor had imposed the condition that he should have liberty to "live and work with the masses of the people." The impulse to this service was quickened by his contacts with Jane Addams at Hull House.

"When I was a stranger," he says, "she took me in, stranger though I was to her except in the fellowship of kindred faith. And I have never since gone out beyond the reach of her friendly counsel, or beyond the range of her varied experience and world-wide sympathy. * * * To her example and counsel is largely due our family residence in a settlement household."

So Chicago Commons became in a very real sense the comrade of Hull House in the great endeavor to carry the spirit and the methods of practical human sympathy, of understanding and inspiration into a big city's region of under-privileged life.

It would be impossible to overestimate the influence which Jane Addams and Graham Taylor have exercised on Chicago—not to speak of the wider sphere in which it has been felt powerfully for human good. It is an ordinary experience today when one meets a business or professional man who displays an alert social-mindedness, a sense of human values, an intelligent interest in social and civic problems, to learn that at one time in his career he was a resident at Hull House or the Commons.

Fruits of Their Labor.

There are many settlements now in Chicago. They, too, are fruits of the pioneering work of Miss Addams and Dr. Taylor. Mary McDowell, at the head of the University of Chicago settlement, and Harriet Vittum, at the head of Northwestern settlement, are names which stand out in social and civic leadership.

Dr. Taylor recently observed his seventy-ninth birthday. He is still erect and vigorous, abreast of his age, his faith in God and man made stronger by experience, his hope for tomorrow high and courageous. The other night 200 of his friends gathered informally at dinner in the City Club, of which he is a charter member, and paid him tribute as their loved and honored guest. Among them were Jane Addams, Julius Rosenwald, Walter L. Fisher, Dr. Robert Morse Lovett, George E. Cole and Dr. Ozora Davis.

PARKING PROBLEMS ENGAGE CLEVELAND

Battle On Between Merchants and the Street Railway, Asking Restrictions.

By N. R. HOWARD.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

CLEVELAND, May 29.—It was four years ago that Will Rogers, savant of a democracy, pronounced the burning American issue to be: "Where can I park my car?" He would be even more right if he pronounced it so today. Out here on the bluffs overlooking the shallowest and most treacherous of the Great Lakes, parking is superseding prohibition—or almost—as something to read, talk, and grow excited about.

The Cleveland Railway Company, which operates the street cars here, has launched its third and most impressive campaign of propaganda before the City Council to have the downtown retail area closed to all automobile parkers. The street cars have been crying for several years for a chance to speed up schedules, and it is no secret that the railway company expects that with no downtown parking permitted, it ought to get more passengers.

Battle has been joined just as seriously by the merchant members of the Cleveland Retail Merchants' Board, which includes all the large department and furnishing stores and downtown groceries. The merchants successfully fought down the railway company's other two movements toward a so-called reform, and are readier then ever to disprove the logic behind this one.

Opinion Freely Given.

There is this about any popular discussion of municipal parking laws and conditions: Everybody in a city of this character has and will express an opinion, and everybody knows from the start that there is no law enforcement in which such a large chunk of human nature plays a part. In New York, metropolitan parking restrictions are anything but new, but mid-Western visitors to New York see the same number of snappy roadsters and languid limousines parked in carefree fashion on any or all of the non-parking Manhattan streets at all hours.

Every time there is pressure to metropolitanize parking conditions, everybody concerned makes a mental reservation as to the probabilities of enforcement.

More than a year ago Chicago forced through legislation which commanded all cars to quit parking inside its Loop. Ever since the experiment was attempted, there have been two sets of reports as to its success and a constant re-enlistment by the forces which opposed the move, so that it is by no means settled just what Chicago will wind up by doing.

Garages Built by Stores.

In the railway's second attempt, it tried to meet this argument by showing that cars parked during the day in front of stores contained something like 1 per cent of actual visitors to the stores. And in the past six years every large Cleveland department store has built for itself a customers' garage near by, arranged for independent parking with transportation to and from the store, or otherwise made its own attempt to make customer parking easier. The big argument in the merchants' case this time is, "Don't deaden a street."

The Cleveland Railway Company brought before a City Council committee two Chicago traffic experts, one connected with a merchants' organization, to testify that the Chicago Loop move had helped the merchants' business and had not "deadened" any streets. The Retail Merchants' Board instantly countered with word from merchants of several Chicago department stores that their business had been hurt.

These battles over downtown parking have revealed compromises and connivances over traffic enforcement. Not publicly, but to responsible persons who appear with their "parked too long" summonses, the Police Traffic Bureau will occasionally admit that it has neither the time nor the man power to make a legal arrest for a parking violation. Ohio law, it seems, would compel the arresting policeman to have seen the car placed in its illegal position and to have watched it until it left; and then to have identified without a shadow of doubt the person summoned as the driver and operating agent of the car.

In Cleveland, so far, the Traffic Bureau has made no test cases of its parking regulations. A few defendants who hired lawyers and offered fight were released. It is not a matter of record, but in some of the cases the Traffic Bureau for months afterward gave these belligerents enough summonses under the parking laws to wad a gun with. Everybody mainly comes in, explains, and pays his $2 or is excused with a warning.

Raccoon's Social Standing Rises in College Favor

The popularity of coon coats with college youths has raised the social status of the raccoon, according to the Natural Resources Department of the Canadian National Railways. The New Brunswick Government has placed the raccoon among the aristocrats of fur-bearing animals by declaring a closed season.

Along with the mink and the fox, the raccoon will enjoy a period of security from the snares of trappers who desire their hides for collegiate splendor.

Indignation of Georgia Laymen Over "Whitewashing" of Cannon

Methodists of the South Are Outspoken in Their Condemnation and Resentful of Lobbying in the Name of the Church

By JULIAN HARRIS.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

ATLANTA, May 28.—Only the echoes of the bitterness aroused by the "whitewashing" of Bishop Cannon have reached beyond the confines of the influence of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Nothing could be truer than Dr. Rembert G. Smith's recent statement that the Methodist Church in the South has entered its tragic era—"tragic error," as one leading layman has termed it. Indeed, so widespread in the South has become the feeling of indignation over the attitude of the Dallas conference that Dr. John E. White, head of the powerful Georgia Baptists' convention, in a prepared statement, condemned the action taken by the Methodist conference on Bishop Cannon's confessed stock gambling.

Dr. White's statement brought out only a mild retort, which was, save on a technicality, in agreement with that of the Baptist leader.

His prepared sermon was delivered in Savannah, and the reply to it came from the Rev. Walter Anthony, pastor of the Wesley Monumental Church there, who was a delegate to and had just returned from the Dallas conference. The Rev. Mr. Anthony asserted that Dr. White was inexact in stating that it was the conference which had whitewashed Bishop Cannon.

"It was," said the Rev. Mr. Anthony, "the committee of Episcopacy which reached the conclusion that Bishop Cannon should not be brought to trial. This action under our law is final. I do not think it should be final, but it is. I am on record as opposing his continuance as chairman of the committee on prohibition and social service."

Some Ministers Bitter.

Some ministers and many hundreds of laymen are bitter in their denunciation of the action. One has only to recall that the Methodists, North and South, split on slavery as a political question. It is unquestionably true that, after its long inactivity so far as politics is concerned, the militant churchmen welcomed the prohibition issue and have thrown their hearts and souls into this fight so enthusiastically that they have failed to notice or willfully ignored the increasing lack of interest of their flocks and the dwindling numbers.

The viewpoint of the Methodist laymen—a very large minority of them, to say the least—is completely opposed to the action of the Dallas General Conference. For it must not be forgotten that hundreds of thousands of Methodists and Baptists in the South did not vote the Republican ticket. Particularly in cities like Macon and Columbus were the laymen opposed to the intrusion of the pulpit into politics.

Among the Georgia laymen who attended the general conference was George S. Jones of Macon, who is not only a recognized leader among the Methodists but is an ardent prohibitionist and supporter of the Eighteenth Amendment. Upon returning from Dallas, where he was a member of the committee on temperance and social service, he made a public statement which contained, he asserted, the summary of the minority report, which was never presented to the conference. Among other things, Mr. Jones said, in line with Dr. White's statement:

"Bishop Cannon admitted before our committee that he was engaged in lobbying before Congress and before committees of Congress and before Legislatures of the States, and stated that he expected to continue to engage in lobbying. This board has, in my opinion, done the Methodist Church more harm than anything else that was ever done officially, and Bishop Cannon has done the cause of prohibition more harm than any other man in the world, for his conduct has been such as to drive many respectable people out of the ranks of prohibitionists."

Cash Not Accounted For.

Mr. Jones asserted that the board headed by Bishop Cannon has spent more than $60,000, "and neither the board nor the officers of the board made any satisfactory account of the expenditures. During the first two (of four) years Bishop Cannon was not required to make any account of what he did with it."

Among those who received money from the board was David P. Cannon, who is a son of Bishop Cannon. He received $3,300. Other figures were given by Mr. Jones, who said he attempted to get the facts before the general conference but the committee on temperance and social service tabled his report. Mr. Jones concluded his statement with the assertion that the attitude of the conference will cost Methodism hundreds of thousands of dollars in contributions to the cause of temperance and other causes and the loss of interest of hundreds of members and the actual loss of hundreds of heretofore stanch Methodists.

But it is to be doubted if the political complexion of Southern Methodism will wear off as quickly as the authority and prominence of Bishop Cannon. And as for forgiving Bishop Cannon, this spirit does not seem to include the enemies on the political side of Southern churches. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has little desire to heal the rift which in Civil War days split the Church. Along this line it is interesting to note that this week at Charlottesville, Va., Southern Presbyterians, while voting for a continuance of negotiations looking to organic union with other churches, heard a veteran churchman, Dr. George Summey, of Austin, Texas, charge that if there was a union with other Presbyterian churches it would mean an acceptance of "materialism, animalism, mechanicalism and even humanism" and Dr. Summey added, "You can scarcely favor a church which besought the Congress of the United States to hang Jeff Davis and others associated with him and have not repented for their sin. We are not ready for such a union."

Home and Foreign Verdicts.

Just now Atlanta is in the midst of entertaining European newspaper men who are touring America. One of them is Felix Salten, the Austrian author, whose "Bambi" is still popular in America and whose latest novel, "The Hounds of Florence," is to be published in this country very soon. When asked as to the popularity of American writers in Europe he replied: "Theodore Dreiser is widely read. His 'American Tragedy' is splendid." The foregoing appeared in the Atlanta Constitution and in a near-by column was the following under a Boston date-line: "The full bench of Massachusetts Supreme Court has upheld the verdict against Donald S. Friede, New York publisher, for selling a book which violated the State obscene book law. Sale of a copy of Theodore Dreiser's 'American Tragedy' brought trial and conviction to Friede, with the imposition of a fine of $300 before Judge Hayes in the Superior Court. The Supreme Court overruled the exceptions in the Friede case and sustained the verdict of the lower court."

Ottawa's Ban on Liquor Shipments to Us A Blow to Vancouver's Profitable Business

By HAROLD L. WEIR.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

VANCOUVER, May 28.—On June 11 the two great liquor warehouses in Vancouver, which have been clearing houses for Canadian liquor entering the United States at this end of the Dominion, will be closed by order of the Ottawa Government. To add to the discomfiture of local distillers and liquor exporters has come the legislation from Ottawa, just passed by the Senate, absolutely forbidding the clearance of any liquor from Canada to United States.

Vancouver is naturally interested in the fate of an industry which, legitimate or illegitimate, has contributed a substantial payroll to this district. Since something less than 2 per cent of the liquor consumed in United States has had its origin in Canada, the Canadian people are not particularly concerned with the present government order as a device that can possibly, by any stretch of the imagination, seriously affect liquor consumption in the United States one way or the other.

But they are concerned, and indignantly concerned, with an order that will affect community prosperity adversely for no other purpose than to flatter the prohibitionists of the United States into thinking that they have woven their principles, not only into the law of their own country, but into the law of neighboring countries as well. In short, there is indignation in cities like Vancouver, where liquor investments run into the tens of millions, at the thought that a profitable industry must be closed up in indirect obedience to a legal experiment being undertaken by another nation.

British Columbia people do not object to stringent laws of their own making. Just the other day a man who had bought two bottles of liquor from a government vendor's store in an Alberta city and then brought it with him to Vancouver was taken to court here and fined for having unsealed liquor in his possession—and this in spite of the fact that the liquor laws of British Columbia and Alberta are almost identical. But no one except the victim was either excited or indignant. The action was countenanced and even approved with the philosophical observation that when British Columbia passes a law that law must be obeyed.

British Columbia people with the same sentiment entirely understand and sympathize with Washington's determination that the American liquor law shall be obeyed. Nevertheless, when the people of this community see thousands of welcome American tourists buying hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of liquor in Vancouver liquor stores without let or hindrance, they naturally question the moral justification of the order that prevents these welcome American tourists from buying the same liquor at home.

The closing of these great liquor houses, jeopardizing their millions of dollars of investments and forcing reduction in their big payrolls, cannot breed unfriendliness toward the people of the United States. At this end of Canada social, economic and industrial relations with United States individuals and companies are too close to be thus disturbed, and this community is too tolerant to blame the American public for the acts of the American Government or acts prompted by the negotiations of the American Government. But June 11 will rankle just the same.

CENSUS GUESSING GRIPS CALIFORNIA

Quality of New Population Is Called Just as Important as Figures for Growth.

By CHAPIN HALL.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

LOS ANGELES, May 27.—Census results are proving to be about as interesting as election returns. The attempt to guess official totals, and the struggle of communities to "outfigger" other communities reached imposing proportions hereabouts. Pacific Southwestern cities have grown amazingly during the decade. Los Angeles County, for instance, exclusive of the metropolis, but tributary to it, has increased 229 per cent. Whether or not, Los Angeles city dispossesses Detroit in fourth place, there remains one important factor which means more than the 750,000, more or less, added population in the last ten years.

Preponderant native-born citizenry, free labor, climate, soil productivity and superior living conditions have served to lay a firm foundation which takes root more deeply than growth which finds expression in impressive census figures, although these are not lacking.

That this citizenship is willing to go far to sustain its premier position was evidenced in the majority given at a recent bond election providing nearly $40,000,000 to insure additional water supply and in a forthcoming $150,000,000 aqueduct project and a road building program involving other millions extending into a stylish array of digits.

Mexican Labor Question.

The Harris bill, which seeks to put Mexican immigration on a quota basis, continues to agitate Southwestern agriculture, which sees in the success of the measure a serious if not fatal handicap. It is the contention of the border States and of those who have to deal with the Mexican labor question that it does not furnish any problem which requires or should have the attention of Congress.

The bill pleases the Ku Klux Klan and the union labor lobby, but if it ever becomes a law will do much toward creating a new race problem in Arizona, Texas and New Mexico, besides offering an uncalled-for affront to a friendly neighbor.

In discussing this question it should be borne in mind that there is no white common labor supply upon which the Southwest can draw to meet its crop and other requirements at peak periods; there is no social problem created by Mexican immigration; it is not a question of cheap labor, since the daily rate of pay for agricultural work in California and the border States is higher than in any other part of the country.

Most of the States whose representatives are all asteam in favor of the bill are intrinsically uninterested in the question one way or the other, and it seems to those whose interests are really affected that they are being used as a political football to provide campaign ammunition for distant office-seekers who are not informed as to the real situation in its true relation to the supply and demand of labor of this character.

A Dirigible Base.

Ever since the battleship base was established in Los Angeles harbor many years ago San Francisco has been much "put out." Especially as the submarine, air, marine, naval and hospital units have been fixed in San Diego and a great air training school near Riverside. All of these are Southern California locations selected because of climatic conditions, and establish effective precedents for locating the dirigible base in the South.

Camp Kearny, near San Diego, one of the great training camps of the World War, affords unusual advantages for the proposed new base.

San Francisco presents as an alternative site Sunnyvale, which, according to the lights of the Southerners, is in perfect inverse ratio to the Kearny site. Should the Sunnyvale "plot" succeed, a plan may later be proposed to remove the battleship base from Los Angeles to San Francisco harbor, on the ground that the two should be coordinated, but more particularly as an unmentioned salve to the afflicted pride of the northern city as a result of census figures which give the Golden Gate town less than half the population of Los Angeles and represent a gain of only 23.2 per cent over the 1920 population, as against an expected 150 per cent for Los Angeles.

One commission has already inspected both sites; and another is coming soon on a new junket. As an arena for national and local political trading the debate is one of the most effective imaginable. And how it is being cultivated is, in the vernacular, "nobody's business."

Music More Than Movie To a Mexican Audience

Music appears to be a more important part of a moving-picture show to a Mexican audience than the film itself. No matter to what an exciting pitch a picture may have risen, if the music stops the audience grows restless, stamps its feet and finally boos.

When a piece of music is over there is applause, and a foreigner is liable to believe that the audience is childishly applauding a celluloid hero; or, if the piece of music happens to end where the villain has just succeeded in a dastardly trick, that Mexicans are heartless and unbelievably cruel.

Senator Furnifold M. Simmons.

BIG VOTE FORESEEN IN NORTH CAROLINA

Keenness of Contest Between Simmons and Baily Shown by the Registrations.

By ROBERT E. WILLIAMS.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

RALEIGH, N. C., May 28.—After eighteen months of agitation and five months of the most extraordinary campaigning North Carolina has ever known, the question of whether or not Furnifold McLendel Simmons must surrender the seat he has held in the United States Senate for thirty years as the price of opposing Alfred E. Smith, Democratic nominee for President in 1928, remains shrouded in doubt.

That doubt will be removed by the primary of June 7, but the character of the campaign which has been conducted on both sides makes intelligent prediction extremely difficult. When Josiah W. Bailey, a leader in the Smith pre-nomination campaign in this State and a former Simmons lieutenant, who broke with the Senator in order to make an unsuccessful race for Governor in 1924 announced his candidacy in January every political observer in the State thought he knew exactly what to expect.

But they were all wrong. When Senator Simmons was last opposed for the nomination in 1912 Mr. Bailey stumped the State for him and was his most effective campaigner. He repeated the performance in 1920 in behalf of Governor Morrison, the successful candidate and the one with the Simmons endorsement. In his own campaign for Governor in 1924 Mr. Bailey made about 200 speeches.

The Issue of Party Loyalty.

This time Mr. Bailey has made no speeches at all and has done everything possible to submerge his own vivid personality in the anti-Simmons campaign he has conducted. Heretofore Mr. Bailey has had opinions on any and all subjects, which could be had for the asking or the listening. This time his opinions have been kept carefully to himself, and he has been exceedingly careful to say or write nothing which would detract in the slightest degree from what he has conceived to be the one issue—party loyalty.

With Bailey in full possession, almost to a man, of what has been known for a generation as the Simmons machine, and with that organization supplemented by the anti-organization politicians of the State, many thought Senator Simmons would lose some of his former reliance on organization and resort more to personal efforts. But that has not been the case. With a nucleus of a relatively small number of personal followers and those who actively approved the Simmons course in 1928, the Simmons forces set themselves the task of building up a brand new organization.

As a result there have been built up the two most elaborate political organizations the State has ever known, but they have functioned in an atmosphere which has given rise to far less public expression than is usual in political campaigns. In fact, the results of this organization work became visible for the first time in the registration period, which closed last Saturday.

Registration of Negroes.

In Raleigh, one place where a new registration was ordered, approximately 11,000 names were placed on the books as against the remarkably heavy vote of 8,889 in the 1928 election. This indicates an extraordinarily heavy vote and most of it will go to Simmons or Bailey, as fewer than 500 have registered as Republicans, although there were 1,969 straight Republican votes cast in the city in 1928. The presence on the Raleigh registration books of about 500 Negroes, of whom about 400 have been registered as Republicans, has created a furor that may have some reverberations on the day of the primary.

However, all attempts so far to develop any enthusiasm over any issue except the issue of Senator Simmons himself have resulted in failure. With no speaking at all on the Bailey side and that for Senator Simmons limited in amount and confined to lesser lights, the campaign has been one of personal work and pamphlets. The pamphlets, which have increased in bitterness and in quantity with the passage of time, have covered a wide range, and some of them, especially those that are the output of local organizations.

WET ISSUE STIRS BAY STATE ANEW

Dry Mass Meeting and Opening of the Senatorial Campaign Promise Hot Politics.

By F. LAURISTON BULLARD.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

BOSTON, May 27.—The Literary Digest prohibition poll registered for Massachusetts 205,371 votes, of which 57,876 were for enforcement of the amendment and the Volstead act, 51,362 for modification of the act, and 96,133 for repeal of the amendment.

And yet last Sunday the Boston Garden held the biggest and most demonstrative dry rally ever known in New England, with 20,000 persons in attendance, of whom many came by special trains over the lines from Gloucester and Haverhill.

To one who reads with intent to be unbiased the news reports of this meeting there seem to have been outstanding features aside from the enthusiasm manifested and the reiteration of the old arguments against repeal of either amendment or act and against the modification of the latter. Also notable were the absence of definite references to such a statement as that of Dwight Morrow a few days before; and the presence of Governor Allen—a candidate for another term, who, with dignified directness, affirms himself a dry—and of former Senator Butler, who aspires to go back to the Senate, and who also has taken the dry side

The example of Abraham Lincoln in declaring for enforcement of the fugitive slave law while announcing his own antipathy to slavery was cited by several speakers. In the mornings, advertisements of the meeting circulated in the churches demanded support for President Hoover. But, especially since the Morrow statement was made, there has been a disposition here to ask just how the President stands on these wet-dry issues.

Constitutional Support.

The attacks of the afternoon centred on the coming referendum on the repeal of the Massachusetts "baby Volstead" act. The real point of the meeting was clearly revealed in the assertion that "not the merits or demerits of prohibition as public policy, but whether we intend to support the Constitution" was the stake in the contest. Repeal of the State enforcement law "would be a straight slap in the face of the letter and spirit of the entire Constitution of the United States," insisted the leading speaker.

The meeting may fairly be called the opening gun of the dry campaign. It was a big gun and it delivered a loud boom. There was a huge crowd and the papers gave the meeting full news value in space and display. Probably the meeting divulged what the dry strategy is going to be—to refrain so far as may be from discussion of whether the amendment was a mistake; or whether "intoxicating" is well defined in the act; or whether "shall have concurrent power" places a State under compulsion to pass an enforcement law or to keep one that has been passed. Of closely reasoned argument on "concurrency" there was little or none. Perhaps such a mass meeting is better capitalized by appeals for enthusiasm.

The drys have been worried. They still are. There have been a good many alarming symptoms of late—the outcome of the elections of 1928; the result of the Digest poll; the outright contention of some highly conservative and respectable newspapers that the State is wet. On the other hand, the wets may have been too confident. Especially just now they are taking counsel as to how much value to assign to such epigrams as that of the woman speaker who said: "As long as the Nineteenth Amendment is there, the Eighteenth will stay."

Lively Politics Forecast.

However, the political year is still young and all "the makings" of a very lively campaign are at hand. The Republicans would like to keep the wet-dry issue in the shadows. Thus both Eben S. Draper, a wet, who is contesting the Senatorial nomination with Butler, and Charles H. Innes, also a wet, in speeches lately have insisted that there are many more important questions before the people today.

There was a lively little exchange between Butler and Draper at a meeting at Salem lately, which indicated what may easily happen once the campaign gets into full swing. The two candidates were speaking from the same platform. Draper ended with: "I am in favor of the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment." Butler followed and opened with: "I am not yet ready to turn over the government, State and national, to the rum interests."

The most interesting event of the week in its possible relation to the Democratic campaign is the appointment of General Edward L. Logan as manager of the George R. White fund, a position commonly called the "largest plum" in the disposition of the administration. The appointment is made by a board of five trustees of which the Mayor is chairman. Does this mean that General Logan will now aspire to the Governorship? The only announced candidate is former Mayor Fitzgerald, and he expects to have the support of Mayor Curley under the rapprochement of months ago. Here may lie the solution of a delicate situation for the Mayor to consider. Both Logan and Fitzgerald are "close" to him.

VIEWS OF EUROPE REFLECTED IN WEEK-END CABLES

LABOR PARTY MOVES TO REFORM SCHOOLS

New Measure Will Keep English Children in Classrooms a Year Longer.

By FERDINAND KUHN JR.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, May 29.—Quietly and without the usual flow of oratory the House of Commons has spent part of the week in launching England upon a long overdue reform.

It has permitted the second reading of a bill which will compel children to stay in school until they are 15 years old instead of 14, as is the rule at present. Unless unforeseen obstacles arise, the bill will become effective next April. Ultimately, if the dreams of England's progressive educators are realized, the age for leaving school will be raised to 16 years, and thus by what appears to be a mere administrative change the government will have made a sweeping alteration in the educational system of the nation.

Children between the ages of 11 and 15 years will have their school life altered by the new bill. In the teeming East End of London and in sleepy country villages it will bring about a minor revolution in the lives of thousands of families in which children who now go to work at the age of 14 years will have to spend another year in the classroom.

"Public Schools" Not Affected.

Eton, Harrow and other endowed academies, where the sons of England's well-to-do families are brought up in ancient and aristocratic atmosphere, will not be affected by the change. The present reform will affect only those elementary schools which are genuinely public as they are in America—thousands of schools in England and Wales where tuition is free, where local authorities pay the bills, assisted by the national government, and where the national Board of Education prescribes studies and methods of teaching.

In the past twenty-five years these schools have made phenomenal progress, yet they are still the Cinderellas of British education. Money just as much as prestige and teaching ability are lavished on the private academies with their hallowed traditions of English "gentlemen." The free schools must skimp along somehow, dependent on inelastic systems of local revenue and on the caprices of the national budget. Their classrooms are often crowded, their teachers underpaid, and yet they have accomplished wonders. They have sent children, on scholarships or otherwise, into the higher schools and ultimately into the great democratic universities like Manchester, Birmingham and London. At last their graduates are beginning to make themselves felt in the British civil service and even in that aristocratic holy of holies, the British Foreign Office.

Courses Lead Nowhere.

For all their merits, however, the schools have suffered from one glaring defect which no amount of enthusiasm can wipe out. With the lack of logic so often found in British life, they lead nowhere. Admirable in many ways, they bring the child through school to the age of 14 years, and then drop him at the very age when he should have a chance to go further. Boys who leave at 14 are thrown into the world to find clerical or office boy jobs, or, failing that, to drift about the streets. Such secondary education as is available is a haphazard venture, and less than 8 per cent of England's children between 11 and 16 years of age attend secondary schools at the present time.

This is what is known as the great gap of English education. For years it has been deplored and denounced by educators. Because of it, Dr. Cyril Norwood, the famous headmaster of Harrow, asserts the money spent on a child's earlier education is wasted just as if it had been spent on shot and shell in war. To close that gap, to give the child a chance to go on into the higher schools and at least to give a well-rounded elementary education, the MacDonald Government is now embarked on the enterprise of raising the school-leaving age.

Parents Oppose Plan.

It is not such a simple undertaking as it sounds. Parents in the poorer English homes are not friendly even to the 14-year rule and do not like the present provision that the child must finish the term he is in when he reaches his fourteenth birthday. There is sure to be much implacable hostility to the 15-year rule from parents who need every penny their children can earn to keep their families fed and clothed. The government, in fact, has been driven to the expedient of "maintenance allowances" on the basis of need in extreme cases. Wherever the family income is less than $2.25 a week, an automatic grant for each child is made. Where the income is more than $3 weekly no grant is allowed.

It is clear, therefore, that raising the school age is an immense financial and social undertaking. Extra teachers and new buildings alone will cost $12,500,000 yearly, while the maintenance allowances payable under the bill will total about $18,000,000. In small rural schools and in certain overcrowded city schools the bill will necessitate separate buildings for the older children—and in the country districts far-off school buildings can bring real hardship. In the face of all objections, however, the Labor Government is confident that it is achieving something of lasting benefit to the Britons of tomorrow.

HOMAGE OF WORLD PAID TO REINHARDT

Famous Director of Deutsches Theatre Has a Memorable Silver Anniversary.

By KENDALL FOSS.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, May 28.—Twenty-five years ago this week Max Reinhardt signed a contract to take over the direction of the Deutsches Theatre, the house which, despite all his travels, always remained his centre of gravity, and not only the theatrical world of Berlin but all Germany and, to judge by the telegrams and letters which have poured in, a large part of the outside world decided to make his silver anniversary a memorable occasion. The University of Kiel made him an honorary Doctor of Philosophy; other universities and many municipalities with which he was associated at one time or another are likewise bestowing honors upon him, and a special festival performance of Johann Strauss's "Fledermaus," in which Reinhardt is to take part, is being arranged by his colleagues for Friday night. "Fledermaus" was his own choice.

When Reinhardt started his Berlin career in the very early years of this century, he had the whole weight of the Royal Theatre and the Meininger group, which likewise was State controlled, against him. This year a working agreement has been effected between the Prussian State theatres and the Reinhardt group which permits the State to profit by his ideas, experience and skill. From a pariah in the eyes of the official stage, he has become an idol. The triumph of his genius can hardly be more clearly demonstrated.

Holds to His Creed.

Reinhardt has a creed which governs every action of his theatrical life. "I believe in the immortality of the theatre. It is the secret hiding place of all those who have put their childhood in their pockets and forsaken it to be played with again only in old age. The actor's art is freeing us from the conventional acting of everyday life, and his task is not to imitate but to reveal. We can fly across the ocean, but the path to ourselves remains as far as the stars. The actor is on this path. With the aid of the poet he climbs toward the still undiscovered land of the human soul, there to fill his own soul with the secrets garnered and to present them to us with all the power of his hands, eyes and mouth. He is an artist and at the same time a work of art; a man on the boundary line between reality and dream, with one foot in each realm."

Many a name known not only to the German theatre-going world but beyond its boundaries has been associated with Reinhardt or worked under him. The man whose directing of plays of as widely differing types as "Oedipus" and "Saint Joan" has placed him in a class by himself is now receiving tributes from Alexander Moissi, Albert Bassermann, Elizabeth Bergner, Gertrud Eysoldt and a host of others.

His Own Laughter Best.

Albert Bassermann recalls Reinhardt's hearty, pleased laughter when a bit of acting gets across as more satisfying to an actor than any ovation he may ever receive. Others recall whimsicalities, his eyes, his reputed preference for blondes, his extraordinary agelessness, asserting that he was seemingly older at 30 than he is now at 57.

Reinhardt was at the height of his power here before he was more than heard of abroad. The Spring of 1914 saw him startle a wondering Berlin with the first production of the "Miracle" in Busch Circus, with Maria Carmi in the leading part. The war cut short his dream of rebuilding the Grosse Schauspielhaus from a circus ring into a theatre seating 5,000 persons. Yet at the first opportunity, in 1919, he carried out this dream and made a huge success.

He toured abroad, bringing the "Miracle" to America, among other things. When he returned it was evident that he had no intention of becoming a back number. Goethe and Shakespeare, Molière and Schiller, Hebbel and Kleist, Hofmannsthal and Shaw, Wedekind and Sternheim, Schneitzeler and Hauptmann—he has triumphantly produced them all and many others, but none of them quite as other producers have visualized them. There is always the unmistakable Reinhardt touch, a touch that endures, keeps him in the front rank of theatrical celebrities and well surrounded by friends ready to take up his defense the minute criticism shows its head.

FATE OF MATCHEK HANGS IN BALANCE

Croat Leader Repulses Offer of Yugoslav Government to End Hostility.

By G. E. R. GEDYE.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BELGRADE, May 28.—In a tiny, stuffy court room, acrid with the fumes of garlic, where I have just passed the morning watching the legal battle surging around the person of the Croat leader, Dr. Vlakdo Matchek, finis is about to be written to another chapter in the history of the attempt to remold the Yugoslav State. In the name of the Croat people, Matchek, although his own fate hangs in the balance after six weeks' trial, has refused in private negotiations to abate any fraction of the Croat demand for autonomy.

Six months' confinement have yellowed the face and bowed the back of the little lawyer of peasant stock, who succeeded Stephen Raditch in the leadership of the Croats, but imprisonment has not availed to break his stubborn spirit. As reported soon after his arrest, unofficial discreet overtures were made to him offering many advantages—a seat in the Cabinet among them—if he would abandon his hostility to the unification scheme in Yugoslavia. Dr. Matchek refused and the trial took its course.

Observers Exonerate Matchek.

I have talked to many disinterested persons who have attended the trial from the start and all agreed that so far not the faintest evidence has been adduced to connect Dr. Matchek with the terrorist activities of the twenty-four other defendants who confess proudly to their amateur bombarding activities. These bombs, incidentally, were obviously not calculated to do much more than detonate with a fizz-pop in order to scare the weaker-kneed among their compatriots.

The trial proved to be the worst imaginable advertisement for the Yugoslav State, largely on account of the revelations which it has brought out of the Serbian police methods in Croatia. It has come at the worst possible moment for the State, as Yugoslavia has urgent need for a new foreign loan. Representatives of the Rothschilds of London, who came to Belgrade when the dictatorship began, but decided against the loan then, have returned. They are still unwilling to grant the loan on the terms desired by Yugoslavia, so the State has requested the French group with which the Rothschilds also have connections to examine the question.

Overtures to Matchek.

With the view of impressing the French with the unity of the kingdom, fresh discreet overtures have just been made to Dr. Matchek. The Premier, General Pera Zhivkovitch, was summoned last week to the King at Nish, where it is understood plans were discussed for an interim régime to induce the Croats through Dr. Matchek to declare their acceptance of the Yugoslav unification plan. The basis of the idea was that General Zhivkovitch should resign his command of the famous Guards division, which gives the dictatorship its military character. Without the support of these finest troops of the Yugoslav Army, Zhivkovitch as a simple civilian friend of the King was to form a party of "King's Friends" based on the composition of the present Cabinet. The Croats would in the meantime be accorded the fullest possible share of control in the home and foreign policies. A number of Croat politicians of secondary importance were persuaded to accept the scheme and some, including Dr. Matchek's personal friend Shibenik, joined the Cabinet last week. The government believed they had surrendered, which, on the eve of the decision on his fate, proved a severe blow to Dr. Matchek, which would force him finally to abandon his opposition.

Plan Was Rejected.

But through the mouth of his advocate and friend, Dr. Ante Trumbitch, Dr. Matchek yesterday formally rejected these overtures in court. After the evidence and all the so-called "loyalty demonstrations" of the Croats who have recently appeared before King Alexander had been collected and organized by the Serbian police in Zagreb, Dr. Trumbitch indicated that the gauntlet of Croat defiance still lay on the floor of the arena where it was flung in January, 1929.

With this declaration it is made plain that the Serbians' sacrifice of name and flag in an endeavor to insure the creation of a new race of Yugoslavians has been useless. The Croat peasantry, says the government, has abandoned Dr. Matchek and stands behind the new Croat Ministers who are willing to cooperate with Zhivkovitch. On the contrary, say the Matchekites, the whole Croat nation stands behind Dr. Matchek and despises the former friends who have betrayed him by entering the Ministry.

Only party elections could show which side speaks the truth, but these are now more distant than ever owing to Dr. Matchek's rejection of the proposals.

The Yugoslav situation again is critical, but any violence on the part of the Croats is unlikely. "For a thousand years the Croats have demanded liberty, but, unlike the Serbs, they have never been prepared to fight for it," was the assurance given me yesterday by a shrewd Serb observer.

Soviet Is in Pre-Convention Throes; Support for Kremlin Policies Expected

June Meeting of Communist Party Will Be Called On to Approve "Striking Socialist Success" in Industry and Agriculture.

By WALTER DURANTY.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MOSCOW, May 28.—The Soviet Union is now in the midst of the pre-convention period with tense discussion of the Communist party's policies raging in the press and at local meetings throughout the country. The convention, which is scheduled to begin June 15, will be the sixteenth in the history of the Bolshevist party, but whereas the earlier years of the revolution saw these meetings held annually, this one will be only the third since the death of Nicolai Lenin early in 1924, and it is now taken for granted that the convention will be a biennial affair unless a grave crisis should make a special session necessary.

This year there will be upward of a thousand delegates—elected, not chosen—from local party centres, with three or four hundred "alternates," who may take part in discussions but will not be permitted to vote. The convention will meet in the former throne room of the Kremlin Palace, which is also the scene of the meetings of the Soviet Congress—the Central Executive Committee and the Council of Nationalities sitting jointly. The latter meets three times a year and is the supreme body of the Soviet State, but the party convention, which theoretically has no State or governmental function, far transcends the Soviet Congress in importance, because it not only discusses and approves the Kremlin policies but determines what is known as the "party lane" for the future and elects members of the central committee of the party and their inner governing group called the Politburo.

Boast of Free Expression.

The Communists boast that the party convention allows complete freedom of expression with only the proviso that once the majority has agreed on a policy the minority opponents must support it unswervingly. The proceedings being secret so far as the foreign press or non-communist Russians are concerned, it is naturally difficult to gauge the truth of this assertion, but the minutes of earlier conventions, published here from time to time, show that controversy used to wax hot and violent and that even Lenin himself was not immune from sarcasm and attack. The fourteenth convention, held in December, 1925, when the Trotskyists made savage but futile onslaughts on the Kremlin administration, seems to have about brought a change in this respect. Trotsky and his supporters were shouted down mercilessly and the fifteenth convention, two and a half years ago, which set the final seal on the defeat of the Trotsky movement and paved the way for Socialist reconstruction of industry and agriculture that has been a feature of the past two years, ran more smoothly, as if the wheels had been well greased beforehand. The same will probably be the case this year.

As the party grows in ardor—the membership has increased by upward of three-quarters of a million since the last convention—and the number of delegates to the convention increases proportionately, it is a natural consequence that unrestricted and more turbulent discussion in a large and unwieldy body would prove impractical or even dangerous. Under Stalin's leadership the party machine functions more perfectly and preliminary caucuses tend more and more to accomplish the real work and submit to convention the cut and dried results. There remains always an element of surprise and possibility of "stampede" oration but as things are managed at present that danger is reduced to a minimum.

Approval Will Be Sought.

It is already clear that this year's convention will be called on to approve the "striking Socialist success in industry and agriculture" as achieved by the "Leftward" policy of the Kremlin since November, 1928, despite the modifications Stalin found it necessary to introduce last March. The "excesses" of Left hotheads in the Winter collectivization campaign will be dismissed as already corrected, and a strong drive will be made against the so-called "Right delegates," who still fear that the socialization process in town and country is being pushed too fast. Editorials and full-page discussions now appearing in the Pravda and other Communist organs show that the "Right heresy" will be the chief target for attack, but it is a curious anomaly—not unknown in politics elsewhere—that the Kremlin's present line is much more conciliatory—in fact, much closer to right—than it was three or four months ago. A similar case occurred at the fifteenth convention, which simultaneously gave the death blow to the Trotskyists and adopted a number of planks of their platform.

At present it seems unlikely that the convention will make any marked change in the Kremlin administration. The sowing campaign, timber and fish and transport "fronts," and various other branches of industry may and doubtless will give rise to criticism. The financial situation looks good on paper with the monthly budgetal income exceeding expenditure, but the currency circulation has increased sharply since the beginning of the fiscal year on Oct. 1, and "bootleg" quotations on Soviet money in Berlin and Warsaw have fallen accordingly. On the whole, however, the record seems to show generally satisfactory achievement, and the administration's position is stronger than appeared to be possible earlier in the year.

Even Spain Has Bootleggers, but They Deal In Contraband Tobacco Instead of Liquor

MADRID.

THE axiom that the world is a pretty small place after all evidently holds true not only in regard to distance but to some customs as well. A Madrid newspaper ran a news item recently which impresses the fact that America is not the only home of bootleggers.

The item reads: "Jorge Kolrenger, aged 20 years, went aboard a French ship lying in the harbor at Barcelona and was offered the opportunity to purchase contraband tobacco. He refused and alleges that in the midst of the ensuing discussion he was overcome and bound. The police went aboard the ship, where they were informed that no such incident had occurred. Search revealed no contraband."

This is one of a few printed statements about bootlegging of tobacco and yet the practice is by no means uncommon. Spain operates a government tobacco monopoly, with results eminently satisfactory to the public exchequer. The Spanish cigarettes made on home soil are not expensive, but foreign "tailor-mades," which are very much in demand, come at high prices, since the monopoly favors "fags" made in factories such as those in which Carmen worked or in the Canary Islands, where the cheap variety known as "Canarios," which sell at five American cents a package, are rolled.

As the news item suggests, ships coming from foreign ports, probably without knowledge of their masters, often carry English or American cigarettes as the case may be. Smokes obtained in this manner are cheaper than those bought through the monopoly. One man boasts that his postman keeps him supplied with tobacco smuggled in this manner, and business houses sometimes have their workers canvassed by venders. Which facts would seem to indicate that people in other lands are just as willing buyers of contraband and that enterprising bootleggers and officials are just as numerous in one part of the world as another. Which is not to say that the business is done on a wholesale basis, as in the case of liquor in the United States, but nothing is done that way here.

TELLS HOW KEMAL BEGAN REVOLUTION

Turkish Deputy Says Order for Mission to Anatolia Was Obtained by a Ruse.

By J. W. COLLINS.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ISTANBUL, May 28.—Falih Rifki Bey, Turkish Deputy and close friend of Mustapha Kemal Pasha, has revealed some interesting events which occurred eleven years ago. On May 19, 1919, Kemal, who was then a General of division, was due to leave Istanbul for Samsoun, a small port of Turkey's Black Sea littoral. He had been entrusted by the Istanbul Government with a mission to exterminate bands of irregular soldiers and bandits who were roaming about Anatolia. This mission had, however, been obtained by a ruse, and it was known by Kemal's intimates that the idea underlying his voyage was the raising of a revolt in Anatolia.

At that time Istanbul was occupied by allied troops, the Sultan's government was impotent and there seemed no hope for an independent Turkey in the near future.

On the morning of May 19, however, relates Falih Rifki, the Sultan summoned Mustapha Kemal to the Yildiz Palace. In a small room overlooking the Bosporus the two men—one the last ruler of the Imperial Ottoman Empire, the other destined to be the first President of the Turkish Republic—sat and talked about the present and future state of the country. After complimenting Kemal on his military prowess during the great war the Sultan said: "You can now render an even greater service to your country." When Kemal asked what we could do, the Sultan replied: "We have strength left, and the only thing to do is obey the orders of the Entente powers and prevent revolution from breaking out."

Warned Against Trip.

Kemal, who through the window could see the allied battleships lying in the Bosporus, with difficulty restrained himself from an angry outburst and only said: "It is best that I proceed to Anatolia without delay." Accompanied by his aide-de-camp he left the palace, went home and bade good-bye to his mother and sister. As he was entering his automobile to drive to the quay two friends warned him that the Istanbul Government and the Entente powers were going to try to prevent him from reaching Samsoun. They told him his ship might be stopped and possibly sunk.

Undeterred by these messages, Kemal boarded the Pandirma, an old Turkish cargo vessel, and started on

PROHIBITION IN THE LIGHT OF SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

The Recent Ruling Determining the Status of the Buyer of Liquor Is One of a Long Series Rendered in a Decade to Clarify the Nation's Dry Law

WHAT has the Supreme Court decided with regard to what is permissible and forbidden under the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead act? The decision last week holding that the purchaser cannot be prosecuted gives the question new emphasis. In the following article the Court's decisions on various moot points is summarized by the attorney for the Anti-Saloon League of America.

By EDWARD B. DUNFORD.

ON May 26, 1930, the United States Supreme Court, in the Farrar case, held that the purchase of illicit liquor cannot be prosecuted for the specific offense of purchase. This decision is not likely to change the practice of the government in the enforcement of the prohibition law, as no one has ever been convicted of the offense. It will, nevertheless, have the effect of definitely settling a question over which some difference of opinion had been expressed.

The court had already refused to review a case in which a defendant was convicted of the unlawful possession of liquor. The net result would seem to be that although the buyer may not be convicted of unlawful purchase, he may be prosecuted for unlawful possession if he acquires liquor under circumstances permitting the government lawfully to obtain evidence of the offense.

The court at the same time, in the Norris case, refused to pass upon the liability of the purchaser under an indictment for conspiracy to transport liquor, owing to the fact that the defendant had entered a plea of nolle contendere, which in the view of the court made it a moot question.

The status of buyers and sellers of liquor having now been definitely determined, it may be of interest to review the decisions of the court upon other questions which have arisen under the prohibition law during the past ten years. Owing to the jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court to render final judgment with regard to the validity and construction of constitutional provisions as well as statutes, the decisions of the court represent a phase of the controversy over the liquor question which should not be overlooked in any consideration of the subject.

Actions Attacking Validity.

Shortly after the Eighteenth Amendment took effect the States of Rhode Island and New Jersey, which had not ratified, through their Attorneys General brought original actions in the United States Supreme Court attacking its validity. These cases were consolidated with five others brought by brewing and distilling companies seeking to enjoin the government officials from enforcing prohibition on the ground of its alleged unconstitutionality, and are officially reported as "The National Prohibition Cases."

The Solicitor General of the United States and an Assistant Attorney General argued the cases for the Federal Government, and the Attorneys General of twenty-four States joined in briefs amici curiae in support of the validity of the amendment. Fifty-six attorneys are recorded as either participating in the argument of the case of joining in briefs for or against the amendment. Included in the list were some of the most eminent members of the bar.

Among the objections urged against the amendment were that it dealt with a subject matter not within the amending power; that it violated the reserved powers of the people protected by the first ten amendments, known as the Bill of Rights; that it was never legally submitted for ratification, and that it was never properly ratified. The court delivered no formal opinion, but on June 7, 1920, announced its conclusions in eleven paragraphs dealing with the many points urged against the amendment or its enforcing statute. The court was unanimous in its conclusions with respect to the validity of the amendment.

The Conclusions Reached.

Briefly stated, the conclusions were that the prohibition of the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation and exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, as embodied in the Eighteenth Amendment, is within the power to amend reserved by the fifth article of the Constitution; that the vote required for the submission of a constitutional amendment is a two-thirds vote of the members of Congress present, provided there is a quorum, and not a two-thirds vote of the entire membership; that provisions of State Constitutions or statutes providing for the submission of constitutional amendments to a referendum have no application to proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution; that the first section of the amendment providing for the prohibition is operative throughout the entire territorial limits of the United States, binds all legislative bodies courts, public officers and officials within those limits, and of its own force invalidates every legislative act, whether by Congress, by a State Legislature or by a Territorial Assembly which authorizes or sanctions what the amendment prohibits, and that its prohibitions could apply to liquors manufactured before the amendment as well as against those subsequently manufactured for beverage purposes.

Later in the Dillon case the court held that the seven-year limitation required for ratification was constitutional, and that the effective date of the amendment was determined by the moment the last Legislature of the necessary three-fourths of the States ratified, and not the date of its proclamation by the Secretary of State.

In the Cunard steamship case it was held that the prohibitions of the amendment applied to both foreign and domestic vessels when within the three-mile limit of the United States and its possessions, but that it did not apply to either domestic or foreign vessels upon the seas.

The amendment was ratified by the Legislatures of the necessary three-fourths of the States on Jan. 16, 1919. By its terms its prohibitions were not to take effect until one year after ratification. In the Druggan case it was contended that the national prohibition act was invalid since it was enacted Oct. 28, 1919. The court sustained the legislative authority of Congress, holding that the amendment became a part of the Constitution upon ratification, although its prohibitions were suspended for one year.

The Eighteenth Amendment provides that Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce it by appropriate legislation. In the national prohibition cases the court declared that "concurrent power" did not mean joint power or require that legislation by Congress to be effective shall be approved or sanctioned by the several States or any of them, nor did it mean that the power to enforce is divided between Congress and the several States along the lines which separate or distinguish foreign or interstate commerce from intrastate affairs. The term was more fully explained by the late Chief Justice Taft in the Lanza case, when he declared "each State, as also Congress, may exercise an independent judgment in selecting and shaping measures to enforce prohibition," although he pointed out that the first section removed all power to authorize acts falling within its prohibition.

State and Federal Laws.

Following this it has been held that State and Federal statutes need not be identical. A State law passed prior to the Eighteenth Amendment may be enforced if it is appropriate to effectuate the prohibitions of the amendment, although the definition of intoxicating liquor is more restrictive than that of the national prohibition act. A State law prohibiting possession of liquor for personal use is valid, though the possession in the home of pre-prohibition liquor is permitted under the Federal law. Likewise, a State statute providing an absolute forfeiture of all interest in vehicles used in the illegal transportation of liquor was upheld, nothwithstanding that the national prohibition act exempts from forfeiture the interests of innocent lienors.

In the national prohibition cases the court held that Congress did not exceed its power by prohibiting liquors containing as much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume and fit for use for beverage purposes. Whether the one-half of 1 per cent limitation applies to non-intoxicating cider and fruit juices manufactured in the home exclusively for home use has given rise to a difference of opinion in the inferior courts. The question has not been considered by the Supreme Court.

The national prohibition act requires users of liquor for non-beverage purposes to obtain permits and medicinal liquor to be sold only by druggists upon prescription by physicians. Litigation arose concerning the scope of authority to grant and revoke permits. In the Ma-King Products Company case the court held that the commissioner was vested with a sound discretion in determining whether the applicant was a fit person to be entrusted with the privilege. In Evarard Breweries vs. Day the court upheld the constitutionality of the supplemental prohibition act of Nov. 23, 1921, prohibiting the manufacture or prescription of malt liquors for medicinal purposes. In Lambert vs. Yellowley the court held by a division of 5 to 4 that the restriction imposed by law limiting the quantity of intoxicating liquor that could be prescribed to not to exceed one pint for use by the same person within any period of ten days, was not arbitrary or without reasonable basis and was an admissible measure for the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment.

The national prohibition cases established that liquors could not be sold for beverage purposes after Jan. 16, 1920. In the Cornell case it was held that the owner of warehouse receipts covering liquor stored in the bonded warehouses at the time the law went into effect could not thereafter withdraw such liquors for domestic consumption in his home. But where liquor was purchased before the law went into effect, stored in a private warehouse and duly reported to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, it was held in the Street case that such liquors could be removed upon a permit to the private dwelling of the owner.

When the national prohibition act was enacted the Supreme Court had not passed upon the constitutionality of a statute prohibiting the possession of liquor acquired before the law went into effect. The question had been left open in the Barbour case. Congress therefore, did not attempt to make illegal the possession in the home of liquors acquired before the law became effective. The court, in Samuels v. McCurdy, has since held constitutional a State law making illegal the possession of liquor so acquired.

The court has ruled that search of a dwelling house by an officer and the seizure of liquor without a warrant is a violation of the Fourth Amendment, and liquors so seized may not be introduced in evidence against the defendant at the time of trial if timely objection is made. The seizure by an officer without a warrant of liquor abandoned in an open field is not unreasonable. It is also lawful for an officer to arrest without a warrant a person committing a misdemeanor in his presence and to seize the evidence of crime.

The national prohibition act provides that when any officer shall discover any person in the act of transporting liquor in any vehicle it shall be his duty to seize the liquor and conveyance and arrest the person in charge. In the Carroll case the court held that the measure of legality in the case of vehicles transporting liquor is whether the officer has reasonable cause to believe that the law is being violated. In the Gambino case it was held that in a State in which there is no State prohibition law, State officers making an arrest and a seizure of a vehicle transporting liquor are presumed to be acting in aid of the enforcement of the Federal law and are subject to the limitations of the Federal Constitution as respects probable cause for seizure and admissibility of evidence.

The court in that case stated that the question of the duty of a State officer to act under such circumstances was not before it. In the Dodge case it was held that for the purpose of forfeiture the Federal Government could adopt a seizure made by State officers. Evidence obtained by officers tapping telephone wires, when there was no trespass upon defendant's property, was held competent by a five-to-four decision of the court.

The national prohibition act declares the premises upon which liquors are illegally manufactured, kept, sold or bartered to be a nuisance, and authorizes a proceeding in equity for its abatement and for restraining the individuals responsible. The provision is constitutional. The court has held that the acquittal of a defendant upon a criminal charge of maintaining a liquor nuisance is not a bar to a proceeding in equity to abate the nuisance; that notice is not a necessary prerequisite to the granting of a temporary injunction; and that the Constitution does not require a jury trial in proceeding for the abatement of a liquor nuisance; also that a United States District Court has jurisdiction to cancel a lease upon petition of the owner of the premises in an injunction proceeding where the evidence shows the existence of a nuisance.

Property Owners' Liabilities.

A property owner who, after notice of the maintenance of a nuisance by a tenant, takes no steps to eject him until after suit for injunction instituted by the government, is not entitled to denial of an order closing the premises for one year. The court declined to review a case in which an injunction was issued against a restaurant where the evidence showed that those in charge permitted a practice of furnishing accessories for the mixing of drinks by patrons who brought their own liquor, although there was no evidence of sale upon the premises.

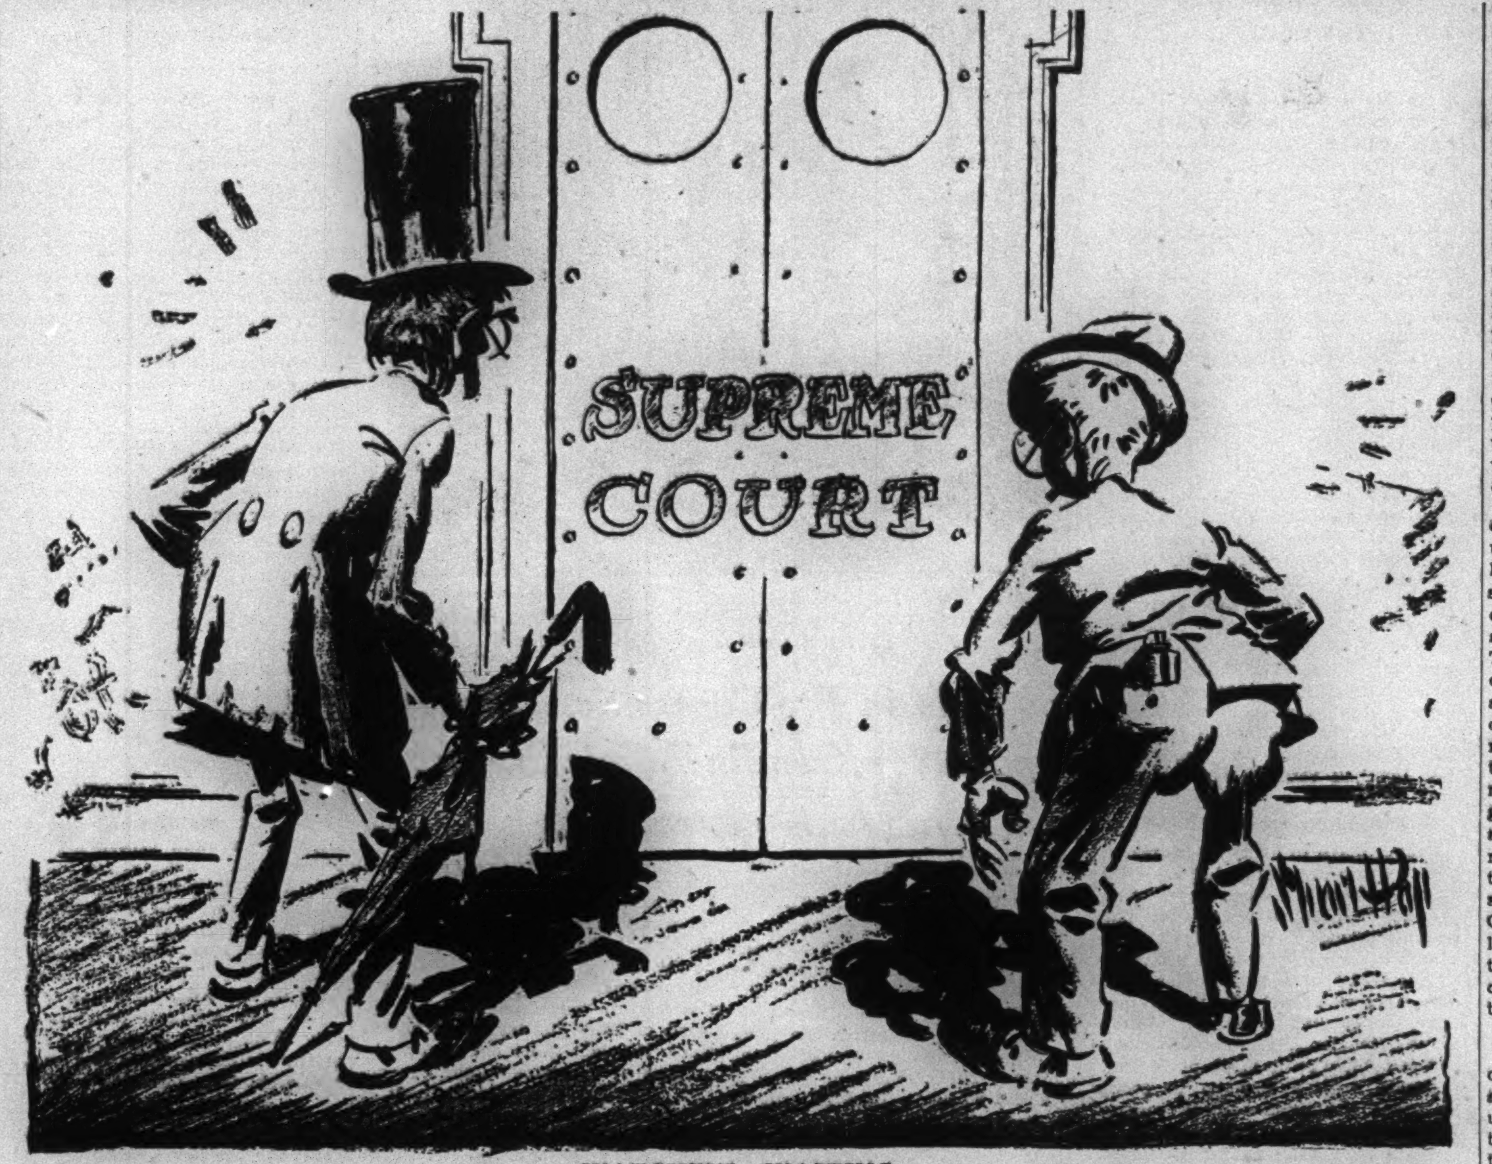
Bottles, corks, labels and similar property otherwise innocent, may be forfeited if sold under circumstances indicating an intention that it is to be used in the unlawful manufacture of liquor. So also may automobiles or vessels used for the unlawful transportation of liquor. Where the offense involves a fraud upon the revenue, the government may, under some circumstances, proceed to forfeit under the revenue laws. But if transportation of liquor is involved, the government must forfeit under the national prohibition act, which exempts from forfeiture the interest of innocent lienors. If it prosecutes the transporter under the prohibition act, it cannot forfeit the conveyance under the revenue laws.

The court has held that a bootlegger is liable for the payment of income taxes on the profits on the illegal sale of liquor, and that illicit liquor may be taxed notwithstanding that its manufacture is prohibited and punished. Contempt of court for violation of an injunction for abatement of a liquor nuisance is an offense within the meaning of the Constitution for which the President may pardon. The same act may constitute an offense against both State and Federal laws under our dual form of government. The same liquor may give rise to a prosecution for a number of offenses with respect to it, such as manufacture, transportation and sale.

Earlier Treaties Supplanted.

The court held, in Grogan vs. Walker, that the Eighteenth Amendment prohibited the transshipment of liquors in customs bond through the United States irrespective of any earlier treaty on the subject. A vessel of foreign registry beyond the three-mile limit engaged in smuggling liquors into the United States by means of small boats was held subject to forfeiture by the District Court, and the Supreme Court refused to grant a writ of ceritorari. The court also sustained and construed the treaty with Great Britain for the seizure of vessels suspected of liquor smuggling when within one hour's sailing distance of the coast, holding that it does not change the territorial jurisdiction of the United States to try offenses against its importation laws. If the ship could not have been condemned for such offenses before the treaty, it cannot be condemned now.

It did, however, extend the distance within which seizures may be made, and if an offense is committed within the jurisdiction of the United States the vessel may be seized and brought in for adjudication. It held that the right of seizure of the vessel under the treaty carries with it by necessary implication the right to prosecute the individuals found aboard; that it authorizes a prosecution for conspiracy as well as for the substantive offenses concerning which the conspiracy was formed and that a conspirator whose part in the offense against the laws of the United States was performed beyond the confines of this country may be prosecuted if he subsequently comes within the jurisdiction of the court.



WATCHFUL WAITING.

COLOR SENSE OF THE MONKEY TESTED BY BERLIN PSYCHOLOGISTS

CAN a monkey distinguish between colors? To find an answer to that question a group of Berlin scientists have been conducting a series of experiments. It has been assumed that monkeys knew colors, but it was not known whether their color sense was strong enough to enable them to attach significance to changing colors. It was found, however, that a monkey could learn that one color meant dinner-time and another did not.

The first proof came from a test that was conducted by Professor W. Trendelenburg of the Berlin Psychological Institute. He put pieces of apple in a box in a monkey's cage and when the box was filled he illuminated it with yellow light. When the box was empty he used other colors for illumination. Finally the monkey understood that yellow signaled the presence of food and that other colors meant there was "no food."

When the monkey came to understand the distinction between yellow and food and other colors and no food, Dr. Trendelenburg carried the experiment another step forward. He found that the monkey, after having served his period of training, would not budge when other colors than yellow were flashed, even if the box contained many pieces of delicious apple. As a final test, a color approximating yellow was thrown on the box. This was the animal's critical moment. He became restless, and, apparently unable to make up his mind just what the signal called him to do, walked up and down his cage.

BOOKS FOR TROUBLED CHINA IN PLACE OF BULLETS

By HALLETT ABEND.

MANY a Chinese warlord has staked tens of millions of ill-gotten riches on a gamble for the extension or maintenance of his personal power, but it has remained for a talented civilian Chinese to stake $500,000 of his personal fortune on a gamble for the extension of education to the Chinese people. This daring person is Y. W. Wong, now managing director of the Commercial Press, Ltd., of Shanghai, who recently sailed from New York for England after spending seven weeks in the United States investigating efficiency systems and the welfare activities of great American corporations.

Mr. Wong's great gamble of his personal resources, which proved a winning gamble but did not increase his personal fortune by a copper, had to do with the publishing of what is called "The Complete Library," a collection of 2,000 volumes including not only the best of China's classical and historical works but translations into modernized Chinese of the cream of the literature, history, philosophy, poetry and scientific writing of most of the other nations.

Many Scholars at Work.

For several years before he became managing director of the Commercial Press, Mr. Wong was chief editor for the company, and as such was in control of a corps of more than 300 eminent Chinese scholars who are continuously employed by the company at translations, editing, writing textbooks and at kindred activities. During those years Mr. Wong, assisted by Dr. Hu Shih, the noted Chinese philosopher, and other leaders of Chinese thought, had worked upon the preparation of material for "The Complete Library," which they hoped to publish at a cost so low that it could be profitably sold at a price that even small and poor Chinese cities could afford. But when the time to decide upon publication arrived, some of the hard-headed directors of the Commercial Press demurred. They feared that the venture would lose much of the company's money.

Then Mr. Wong acted. He ordered $500,000 worth of white paper from America—enough for the projected edition of 5,000 sets of 2,000 volumes each. And since the Commercial Press would not guarantee the purchase price of the paper, Mr. Wong pledged his own personal fortune to cover the cost. "The Complete Library" made its appearance last year, the sets of 2,000 volumes selling for $350. Just before he sailed from New York Mr. Wong received a cable from Shanghai announcing that most of the edition had been sold out and that already 4,300 sets had been paid for in full.

Mr. Wong, while refusing to discuss Chinese politics or China's civil wars, declared:

"The only hope for the Chinese people lies in the spread of education, and in the rapid extension of lines of communication. Without education, highways and railways, the unification of the country presents a difficult problem."

Mr. Wong had never left China until he sailed for the United States on March 14. San Francisco he found amazing; Chicago he termed "colossal" and New York "indescribable." But he was so delighted with American life, and with the cordiality with which he was everywhere received, that he hopes to return for the Chicago World Fair in 1933.

While he was in the United States Mr. Wong made a personal inspection of more than forty factories and publishing establishments, and held conferences with more than thirty efficiency experts, managers, labor union leaders and welfare directors. These activities resulted in notes totaling more than 250,000 words which embody his impressions of the United States. He also found time to interview many young Chinese, graduates of American universities, and to engage six of them to return to Shanghai as the nucleus of an elaborate general research department which he will found upon his return there in September. He expects to engage at least four more young men for this work from Chinese graduates of English and German universities while he is in Europe.

Mr. Wong, at the age of 43, is at the head of more than 6,000 employes. The Commercial Press, which is the largest Chinese organization of its kind, was founded only thirty-five years ago, and has been so successful that today the total issue of capital stock is only $5,000,000 Mexican, but the value of its many properties, acquired with earnings, is many times that figure, for the printing plant alone covers more than twenty acres of ground in Shanghai, and there are many branches in that city. Branch printing establishments are maintained in Peking and in Hongkong, branch offices are operating in thirty other Chinese cities, and the company has more than 1,000 agencies throughout China and in foreign countries wherever Chinese colonies are located.

More than 30,000 different books have been published by the company during the last thirty-five years, and 300 others are in course of preparation. In addition, the company publishes magazines and issues more than two-thirds of the textbooks used in the Chinese schools.

The workmen in the employ of the Commercial Press are said to be the highest paid in China, and are all protected by group life insurance paid for by the company. Annual bonuses are paid, and liberal pension arrangements benefit the retired employes or the families of those who die in the company's service. Interest is paid on savings accounts which employes open with the company, free schools are maintained for the children of the workmen, a dispensary is in charge of foreign-trained physicians, and a nursery is provided for the children of women workers. The company also makes a maternity allowance to expectant mothers.

Correspondence School.

In addition to its publishing activities the Commercial Press conducts a correspondence school from which more than 32,000 Chinese have been graduated, and is also responsible for the Oriental Library in Shanghai. This library, open for the free use of the public, was built primarily for the use of the company's editorial staff. It houses more than 200,000 volumes in Chinese, and about 100,000 volumes in other languages, besides subscribing to more than 700 newspapers and periodicals from all over the world, and collecting and preserving rare Chinese books on China.

Mr. Wong, the head of this great organization, is a Southern Chinese having been born in Kwangtung Province, not far from the city of Canton. Though he is known in China as "the living encyclopedia," Mr. Wong had scarcely any schooling. Today, besides being a noted Chinese scholar, he speaks, reads and writes English, German, French, Japanese and a little Latin, having taught himself all of these languages.

In spite of his many other activities during the last few years, Mr. Wong found time to work out and perfect a symplified system of writing and printing Chinese, called the "Four Corner Numeral System." This new system is so practical and so simple, when compared with the old method, that during the last two years it has been adopted by more than 1,000,000 users in China and abroad.

The beginning of the Chinese Revolution, in 1911, found Mr. Wong a professor in the National Institute at Woosung, near Shanghai. When the first Provisional Government was established, after the abdication of the Manchu Dynasty in 1912, he joined the Ministry of Education and also served as secretary to the late Dr. Sun Yat-sen, then Provisional President of China. Later he became Director of Higher Education in the Ministry of Education, and for a time was Vice Minister in that Cabinet office. While he served the government in these capacities he was also teaching in the Chung Kuo University, and was editor of the Peking Republican Daily News.

Mr. Wong views the corporation of which he is the head not as primarily a money-making concern, but as an organization which by helping to make education easier and cheaper for the Chinese masses, will give fundamental help to solving China's manifold woes. It is with a view to learning from foreign peoples methods by which his company can more efficiently forward this cause that Mr. Wong is now making his trip around the world.

MUSSOLINI'S FIERY TALK AIRS ITALY'S GRIEVANCE

Behind the Duce's Recent Speeches Is a Purpose to Bring Unsatisfied Claims Against France to World's Attention

By ARNALDO CORTESI.
Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.
ROME.

AFTER many years wherein all his utterances were distinguished by marked moderation, Premier Mussolini this month delivered three important speeches at Leghorn, Florence and Milan, in which he reverted to the "strong manner" which used to feature his oratory in the first period after the establishment of the dictatorship. His fiery remarks, universally interpreted as being aimed at France, spread the impression that Italo-French relations had reached a dangerous and critical stage. Some, indeed, with pessimism unjustified by events, felt that war was imminent.

Many throughout the world must have asked themselves the reason for the sudden change in Mussolini's tone. The outcome of the London Naval Conference and France's refusal to grant Italy naval parity did not seem a sufficient justification because, obviously, if Mussolini still hopes to be able to induce France to yield to Italy on the question of their relative naval strengths he must realize that by waving the spectre of war in France's face he is more likely to stiffen than to soften French resistance. We must, therefore, look elsewhere for an explanation.

It is more likely that Mussolini deliberately delivered the three bellicose speeches in an attempt to focus the attention of the world on the Franco-Italian situation. Probably he argued that if the world suddenly were startled one fine morning by reading in the newspapers that Franco-Italian relations had reached a dangerous pass somebody somewhere would be moved to inquire what all the fuss was about. Italy feels she has several perfectly just and legitimate grievances against France and has everything to gain and nothing to lose from an impartial investigation.

Threat to Peace Revealed.

If this was his object Mussolini can congratulate himself on a fair measure of success. Italo-French relations, which for years have disguised their dangerous possibilities under the cloak of normality, suddenly were revealed to the world as a threat to peace. Interest in Italy's grievances suddenly developed in all sorts of unexpected places. If publicity was what Mussolini wanted he certainly got it.

Franco-Italian differences fall into four main groups:

1. Italy's unsatisfied claim for colonial compensation in Africa as laid down by Article XIII of the Treaty of London, which contained the conditions on which Italy entered the war on the side of the Allies.

2. The status of Italians in the French protectorate of Tunis.

3. French support of Yugoslavia against Italy and her alliance with that small but turbulent kingdom which Italy considers a direct threat against her security.

4. Italy's claim to naval parity with France.

Taking first the African colonial question, it is to be recalled that Italy attained independence when the other European powers had already grabbed almost everything worth grabbing in Africa. Italy looked with longing eyes at Tunis, which since the nineteenth century has been settled almost exclusively by Italians, hoping that some time a favorable occasion would present itself for annexing it. Instead, at the Berlin Congress of 1878, Lord Salisbury and Bismarck encouraged France to seize Tunis for herself, which France did in 1881. Bismarck obtained his object, which was to force Italy into a triple alliance with Germany and Austria; but losing Tunis was the heaviest blow to young Italy's aspirations.

Red Sea Rivalry.

Its hopes of Tunis having vanished, Italy between 1882 and 1889 conquered Erythrea on the Red Sea, but here again she was preceded by France, which already possessed the port of Djibouti, the best harbor on the Red Sea and vitally required by Italy if she was to reap the full benefits of her colonial venture. By a curious trick of fate, it was France again which balked Italy's hopes when the latter annexed Libya in 1911. Italy found, in fact, that France, by virtue of the so-called Franco-British declaration of 1899, had established a French zone of influence over the Libyan hinterland.

Thus, more perhaps by chance than by deliberate intent, France came to be considered by Italy as the arch-enemy of Italian colonial aspirations. In fairness, however, it must be said that France did nothing to dispel this impression, especially after the war when both expediency and duty should have counseled her to meet Italian demands for a colonial outlet.

Italy hoped that her participation in the World War would enable her partly to remedy her deficiency in colonial possessions, which the crowded state of a country of swelling population rendered most necessary. The London treaty, which laid down the conditions on which Italy entered the conflict on the side of the Allies, contained this clause: "In the event of France and Great Britain increasing their colonial territories in Africa at the expense of Germany, those powers agree in principle that Italy may claim equitable compensation, particularly as regards the settlement in her favor of questions relating to the frontiers of the Italian colonies of Erythrea, Somaliland and Libya and the neighboring colonies belonging to France and Great Britain." On this clause Italy bases her present claim against France.

At the Paris peace conference Italy asked France and Great Britain to honor their agreement and demanded of England the cession of the oasis of Jarabub near the eastern frontier of Libya and the valley of Juba and harbor of Kismayou at the southern border of Italian Somaliland. Italy asked France to rectify the western frontier of Libya with access to the mountain range named Tibesti and Lake Tchad and the cession of Djibouti and the French railroad line from that port to the Abyssinian capital of Addis Ababa. As Great Britain and France between them had annexed the whole of the vast German colonial empire comprising hundreds of thousands of square miles of territory and several millions of population, Italy thought her demands more than reasonable. The harbor of Djibouti and the oasis of Jarabub alone have any importance, while the valley of Juba is a fever-infested region inhabited only by a few nomad shepherd tribes. The territories which Italy would have acquired by the rectification of the western frontier of Libya almost all form part of the Libyan desert, with a few scattered oases inhabited by only a few thousand natives. Yet both Great Britain and France refused the Italian request, which was considered outrageously exaggerated. When peace with Germany was signed, Italy again saw her hopes of expansion in Africa shattered.

British Concessions.

It was not until almost six years after the war that Great Britain made good its promise. In July, 1924, Great Britain ceded to Italy the valley of Juba and the harbor of Kismayou. She could not at the same time cede the oasis of Jarabud because she had meanwhile recognized Egyptian independence, under whose sovereignty the oasis had passed. Great Britain, however, offered its good offices, with the result that this question also was settled satisfactorily for Italy. Great Britain, therefore, met Italian demands in full.

Not so France. In September, 1919, France by the so-called Bonin-Pichon agreement granted Italy a small rectification of the western frontier of Libya, which brought only one moderately important oasis named Grat under Italian sovereignty, but did not mention the Tibesti mountains and Lake Tchad, in which Italy is interested because these lie far to the south of the area affected by the agreement.

France now takes the stand that the Bonin-Pichon agreement was intended to settle all Italian claims arising from the London treaty. Italians instead maintain it was distinctly understood when the agreement was concluded that rectification of the western frontier of Libya was only a first payment on France's part, with more to follow. As proof of their contention the Italians point out that the preamble of the Bonin-Pichon agreement explicitly states that other points are reserved for future examination. The French reject this interpretation absolutely. The Italians feel that even if the French can hold up their viewpoint in international law, namely, that they fully settled all Italians claims—which is doubtful—they have been guilty, to say the least, of very sharp practices and sorely abused Italian good faith.

The Question of Tunis.

Whatever the rights and wrongs of the question may be, there is no doubt that Italy feels that France owes her something. France may claim this feeling is quite unjustified, but it exists nevertheless and must be reckoned with.

The question of the status of the Italians in Tunis is not less thorny and no less a cause of constant irritation to Italians. As has been said, Tunis originally was settled almost entirely by Italians. Even today, after years of efforts to denationalize Italian residents, France herself confesses that there are 89,000 Italians in Tunis against 71,000 Frenchmen. The Italians dispute the correctness of these figures and claim an Italian population as high as 130,000. In any case it is certain that Italians form an enormous majority of the resident population while the French are largely composed of officials of various sorts and others who live in Tunis only temporarily.

Italian residents have been protected since 1896 by a consular treaty which, in view of their overwhelming number, granted them special privileges, safeguarding them against forced denationalization. In 1919 when Italy advanced her claim against France for colonial compensations in Africa the French replied not only refusing the Italian demand but denouncing the consular treaty, at the same time threatening the Italian colony of Tunis with compulsory denationalization after the second generation. Italian protests only succeeded in having the consular treaty renewed every three months, with the result that Italian residents live, as the Italian press aptly puts it, under a constant threat of the sword of Damocles.

Italy, moreover, complains that France discriminates unfairly against Italians residing in Tunis. For instance, nobody can practice law unless he possesses a French degree. Nobody can open a drug store without special permission of the French Government. Italian workers are discriminated against in the matter of wages, &c. All this is done with the evident intention to force Italians to assume French citizenship.

Finally, Italy complains that France refuses to allow any Italian schools to be opened beyond those already existing, which are insufficient for the needs of the Italian colony. The French action, the Italians contend, is rather high-handed even in a French colony, but becomes downright unbearable and illegal in a territory which is only a French protectorate.

The Tunis problem therefore holds countless opportunities for Italo-French friction. Hardly a day passes that something does not happen to remind Italians of the attempt being made forcibly to turn into Frenchmen some scores of thousands of their nationals living on the opposite shore of the Mediterranean.

The two foregoing problems are grave, but the question of French support of the military alliance with Yugoslavia is even graver, for the Italians consider it a threat against their national security. Italy, which slowly, at the cost of much blood, painfully won its independence from Austria, lived the first half century of its life under the constant shadow of the Hapsburg monarchy, which it considered its natural enemy. The World War completed the disruption of the Austro-Hungarian Empire and relieved Italy of this menace, but the respite was short-lived, for Yugoslavia soon stepped into Austria's shoes and, urged on by the fatal quarrel over Fiume at the Paris peace conference, seemed to inherit all of Austria's anti-Italian propensities. It naturally also inherited Austria's place as Italy's traditional enemy.

Italy has not forgotten that France sided with Yugoslavia in the Fiume question. Italy looked on with ill-concealed apprehension, while the tie between France and Yugoslavia has been bound ever closer from that day to this. When announcement of the French-Yugoslavian alliance in 1926 unleashed violent anti-Italian demonstrations throughout Yugoslavia, Italians felt their fears justified. This feeling was confirmed when every pro-French demonstration in Yugoslavia degenerated into an anti-Italian riot.

Italians think France deliberately created, nursed and fostered Yugoslavia as a tool of her anti-Italian policies. They believe France is arming Yugoslavia and maliciously egging her on against Italy. They are convinced that most of Italy's troubles with Yugoslavia are born in France. They are told by trustworthy eyewitnesses that at the port of Sussak, only a stone's throw from the Italian port of Fiume, French steamers may be seen daily unloading enormous quantities of war supplies.

Perhaps there is some exaggeration in the above. But the point is that the Italians believe it, which cannot but affect their attitude toward France.

"The Last Straw."

The London naval conference is still too recent for many words to be wasted to explain the reasons for Franco-Italian differences on that score. Suffice it to say that the Italians consider that France deliberately sought to inflict a humiliation upon Italy by refusing her a rank equal to her own in the hierarchy of nations, which, in the Italian view, is measured largely by the fleet each nation possesses. This, coming on top of all her other grievances, real or imagined, was the last straw. It caused resentment which for years had remained latent to boil over as soon as Mussolini took off the lid in his three recent speeches.

To the four main causes of Italo-French friction other minor ones may be added. The chief is the hospitality France accords to anti-Facist plotters. Every time some Italian in France is shot down by anti-Fascists—this unhappily occurs all too often—this wound is reopened. The complacency with which the French courts regard such crimes does nothing, naturally, to heal it.

The question often is asked: What does Italy want of France? This article has attempted to answer that question. Briefly summed up, what Italy asks is this:

1. Italy wants colonial compensations in Africa. The hope of obtaining the cession of Djibouti probably was abandoned long ago. Italy would now be content to obtain rectification of the western frontier of Libya, to rule Tibesti and, if possible, also Lake Tchad.

Guarantees for Italy.

2. Italy wants adequate guarantees for the future for her nationals in Tunis by the renewal for a period of years of the consular convention of 1896 or by a stipulation in a similar convention that provisions will be made for the Italian colony to have a sufficient number of schools.

3. Italy wants a guarantee that France will not continue to turn Yugoslavia against her.

If the above points are conceded, Italy gladly would enter into a "Mediterranean Locarno" such as was suggested at London, after which the solution of Italo-French naval differences probably would not present insurmountable difficulties.

Italy does not wish even to discuss a Mediterranean Locarno until the other problems are settled, because she fears by so doing she would be relinquishing her main bargaining power for a solution of the questions that interest her infinitely more. In other words, if France felt perfectly secure in the Mediterranean, she would be unlikely to yield to Italian demands in the colonies, Tunis and elsewhere.

After a period of extreme tension in Franco-Italian relations, caused chiefly by the Franco-Yugoslavian alliance, negotiations were opened in Rome in March, 1928, between the Italian Government and the French Ambassador for a solution of all difficulties between the sister Latin nations. They began in an almost idyllic atmosphere of cordiality. Just previously Briand had declared in the French Senate that he hoped to re-establish an entente as fraternal and as cordial as any one could desire. Shortly afterward Mussolini, speaking in the Italian Senate, said the progress of conversations held out great hopes for their happy conclusion. Now France and Italy are as far apart again as they ever were.

It is to be hoped that the earnest work done on both sides to reach pacification would not be entirely lost and that the conversations may soon be resumed with a better chance of success. Certainly Italy has no desire to continue a state of enmity with France. It is sufficient to read the speeches delivered in the Italian Chambers of Deputies during the recent discussion of the budget of the Minister of the Navy to convince one of that. But it is equally certain that no agreement will be reached unless France shows a disposition to meet Italian demands half-way.

LABOR VERSUS MACHINES: AN EMPLOYMENT PUZZLE

A Revolutionary Decade in Machinery Emphasizes Anew the Discarding of Men Displaced in Industry

By WILLIAM GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

WHAT we call technological unemployment is not a new thing. The history of technical progress has had its parallel in suffering and retrogression among those wage earners from whom machinery had taken opportunity to do the work upon which they relied for a living. A wage earner has to have a job in order to meet his living expenses. As his reserve margins are small, loss of his job is the shadow of the fear that is the background of labor thinking.

It is bad to lose a job, but it is a catastrophe to lose one's trade skill. When craft skill is "transferred to a machine" the craftsman is industrially bankrupt. Craft skill that was an investment of a lifetime of work goes to the industrial scrapheap when scientists find new processes, or inventors produce new machines. Their trades are gone and, because workers must live, they seek jobs in other callings—often at lower incomes and with consequent lower standards of living.

On the other hand, technical progress means more things at lower prices and consequently more physical comforts and greater ease of living for greater numbers of people. Technical progress is the means to higher material civilization. Progress comes from change. Change means dislocation. It is a sad commentary that individual wage earners have paid the social costs of technological progress in industry.

Change and the Worker.

Even though there follows an industrial readjustment or expansion that provides employment for a greater number of people, the displaced wage earners suffer hardships through no fault of their own. Society has accepted the gain without an effort to pay its debt to the wage earners. Today our captains of industry recount with pride increases in productivity, installation of machines, new technical procedures that effect extraordinary economies and salvage former waste products. They glory in things—in technical progress, in management, in the progress of science—but what thought do they give to musicians displaced by music reproductions; to the art of the actor, forgotten in the latest movietone; to the Morse operator displaced by the teletype; to the steel worker displaced by a new process; to the carpenter watching a house assembled by units; to the printer turned out by the teletypesetter?

Such workers in thousands have been turned out without jobs, and without the possibility of future employment in the craft in which they have invested their all. Even though in a few years the industries may expand sufficiently to give employment to even more people than before, that does not solve the workers' imperative problem—how to earn money to pay next week's rent and to buy food for hungry children tomorrow.

This is the side of the progress which workers have felt to the marrow of their bones. Samuel Gompers in his autobiography relates of the silk weavers of London a story that left an indelible imprint on his mind and life. New weaving machinery had made useless their expert craftsmanship. They walked the streets, vainly seeking work. Over and over again the child Samuel Gompers heard their moan, "God strike me dead. I've no work and my kids are hungry, with no bread to eat." When this is the meaning of technological unemployment to wage earners, is it strange that some of these silk weavers in passion broke into the factories and smashed the new machines?

In striking contrast to the introduction of many new machines was the introduction of the linotype, replacing hand setting of type. The machine worked a revolution in the work methods of the industry and seemed destined to put all printers on the streets looking for work. However, the union, which is the repository of work experience, saw the problem developing and proposed that instead of fighting the introduction of machines they seek an opportunity to operate the linotype. This course prevailed, and the situation was met constructively. Skilled craftsmen got better results from the machines than those who knew nothing of printing could possibly have got.

There is no industry that is not making greater use of mechanical devices than it did twenty-five years ago. This means that mechanical manipulation and lifting power is replacing human skill and human lifting power. The molder who formerly made his own mold by hand and poured his own metal now uses a machine-made mold and manipulates a switch that controls the flow of his molten materials. The cigar maker formerly took special pride in the skill of his trained hand in selecting his leaves and rolling his cigar. Now he uses a machine and turns out more cigars. Cigarettes are made practically without the intervention of a human hand. Sensitive machinery selects for packing with even greater sureness than the former skilled packer.

Change in Methods.

The replacement of workers by machines has been going on ever since the beginning of the factory system. Gradually, through the years, machines have taken over work which used to be done by hand, so that if we compare present methods with those of a century and a half ago we see astonishing changes. For instance, one girl with modern spinning machinery in a textile mill, working an eight-hour day, can turn out as much yarn as an army of 45,000 with spinning wheels 150 years ago. Similar changes have occurred in other industries over this long period of time.

But the amazing thing about the last ten years is that changes affecting thousands of workers have taken place almost over night. In some industries machines have been introduced so rapidly that in a few years' time changes have occurred comparable to a century of earlier progress. Take, for instance, the manufacture of electric light bulbs. In 1918 it took one man a whole day to make forty electric light bulbs. The next year came a machine that made 73,000 bulbs in twenty-four hours. Each of these machines threw 992 men out of work. In the boot and shoe industry 100 machines take the place of 25,000 men. In the manufacture of razor blades one man can now turn out 32,000 blades in the same time needed for 500 in 1913.

In Automobile Plants.

In automobile factories similar changes have taken place. In a Middle Western State today a huge machine turns out completed automobile frames almost untouched by the human hand. About 200 men are needed to supervise this vast machine, and they turn out between 7,000 and 9,000 frames a day. Compare this with a well-known automobile plant in Central Europe where the same number of men are making automobile frames by older methods. They turn out thirty-five frames a day. In steel blast furnaces seven men now do the work of sixty in casting pig iron; and even in the last three years, since 1926, the improvements in technical processes have reduced the necessary work force in the Bessemer process by 24 per cent. In machine shops one man with a "gang" of semi-automatic machines replaces twenty-five skilled mechanics. Thirty workers with ten machines can now do the work of 240 in the Sun Tube Corporation machine shop. These examples could be multiplied indefinitely.

But, you may say, these are after all only instances from a few of our many industries. Has the change really been so great as to affect our whole industrial system? Yes, it has. The illustrations given above are typical of a process which has been happening throughout American industry today at an amazing rate of speed. The rate of change in the last ten years has been so rapid that developments which were formerly spread over a half century or more now take place in a few years' time. We have figures which show what has happened since 1899 and what this change means to wage earners.

Production and Employment.

Take the record for all manufacturing industry in the United States. In the decade from 1899 to 1909 production increased 59 per cent. Improved machinery played some part in this increase, but it was largely made possible by taking on more wage earners, for the number of wage earners employed by our factories increased 40 per cent from 1899 to 1909—that is, 1,903,000 more wage earners were taken on to bring about this 59 per cent increase in production. [Figures from Census Monograph, "The Growth of Manufactures," United States Bureau of Census.] Similarly in the decade from 1909 to 1919, production increased 35 per cent and employment increased 38 per cent. Increased production was made possible by employing 2,481,000 more wage earners. This meant jobs for nearly 2,500,000 more men and women.

Now in the decade from 1919 to 1929 developments took an entirely different turn. Production increased as before, so that our plants were turning out 42 per cent more in 1929 than in 1919. But this increase was made possible without any increase in the number of wage earners employed. Employment actually decreased 7 per cent from 1919 to 1929. Forty-two per cent more goods were produced with 585,000 fewer workers. This general increase was made possible by the introduction of new machinery and modern methods of manufacture. Increasing production, instead of creating more work, actually took away 585,000 jobs. [Figures from Federal Reserve Board and United States Census of Manufacturing.]

The producing power of the average wage earner increased 11 per cent in the twenty years from 1899 to 1919; but in the short space of ten years from 1919 to 1929 (half as long), it increased 53 per cent. [Figures from Federal Reserve Board and United States Census of Manufacturing.]

These great changes have so limited the number of wage earners needed in our manufacturing industries that men and women are forced to walk the streets, looking for work. To be sure, some jobs are created in the service industries, where employment has been increasing in the last decade, but these are not nearly enough to make up for the changes in manufacturing.

Although technological unemployment is no new story, the rate at which technical progress has come in the last twenty-five years makes displacement of workers a very different problem. The rapidity and the scope of scientific progress has made technical procedure practically fluid. The period of recent economic prosperity made it possible for industries to install the newest machinery and the newest processes without hesitation. Abundance of capital facilitated the development of new industries.

These new industries helped to absorb workers released by older industries. But some of the new industries, particularly automobiles, are most unstable and have by far the highest fluctuation in payrolls of all industries.

A Growing Labor Problem.

During June, 1929, industrial production in the United States reached a new record peak. Even this stupendous output failed to supply employment to all seeking work. The records of the American Federation of Labor showed 9 per cent unemployment among trade union workers during that period of record breaking production. In the Summer of 1927 the federation had been sensitive to recurring reports of unemployment from all parts of the country and instituted a system of monthly reports from the local unions of twenty-four industrial centres. The summary of these records is an interesting document. We are satisfied that the sustained high rate reflects, among other forces, unemployment due to mechanization of industry.

Nearly one-third of the wage earners in the United States depend on manufacturing industries for their jobs. Our wage earner population is increasing, while jobs in manufacturing industry decrease. Since 1919, the normal increase in population means over 5,500,000 more persons who want work as wage earners, while jobs in manufacturing have decreased by 585,000. Thus we need more than 6,000,000 new jobs.

The "newer" industries, such as gasoline stations and automobile repair shops, barber shops and beauty parlors, hotels and restaurants, have given work to some of this army of job seekers, for employment has been increasing in these lines. Professional work has also been increasing. There are more teachers, doctors, dentists, oculists. But all these new industries put together have not been nearly enough to take care of the 6,000,000 who want work. A recent study of 754 persons laid off from manufacturing plants shows that only 15 per cent were able to find work in these "newer" industries.

The Hardships Involved.

Also there is the problem of job adjustment. For a man laid off in a steel mill where new machinery has just been installed cannot go tomorrow and take up work as a barber, and he certainly is not prepared for the professions. Even in hotel and restaurant work and in gasoline stations, where less training is required, there are new skills to be learned, and men with experience are likely to have preference.

The problem facing those workers who are laid off from their jobs is well illustrated by the above-mentioned study, covering 754 wage earners laid off from factories in three American cities in 1928. [Study by Isador Lubin, Institute of Economics, Washington, D. C.] The study showed that it is by no means easy to find work. Of those who were able to find employment only 11.5 per cent were able to find a job in less than a month. Over 60 per cent—that is, nearly two-thirds—had been out of work for more than three months, and 32 per cent—nearly one-third—were out for six months or more. Thirty-five persons, or 5 per cent, had been out for a year.

Most of these wage earners had to support themselves and their families by drawing out their savings accounts during this long period of unemployment. Less than one-third—only 31 per cent—were able to find temporary employment of any sort. This meant serious privation and often permanently lowered living standards for their families. Children at school have to go to work at times like these; boarders must be taken in, often overcrowding the family; debts are run up at the grocer's and other stores; and sav-

OUT OF POLITICS.

Senator WATSON of Indiana is a great stickler for the proprieties. He assured the Senate: "I never quote the President of the United States; I do not think it is fair to do so." Thereupon, having laid down the correct principle, Mr. WATSON proceeded to violate it by citing the exact words of Mr. HOOVER: "I want a non-partisan commission. If the tariff can be taken out of politics, I want it taken out of politics." There is great virtue in your "if." Senator WATSON went on to say that he himself did not believe that the tariff could be taken out of politics, any more than the blood could be taken out of a man's body, but since millions of people were anxious to deal with the tariff so that it should never again become a political question, he was not the man to say them nay in their amiable but futile endeavor.

It is plain that the President, if he gets a non-partisan Tariff Commission of the kind he desires, will give that as an excuse for signing the tariff bill, if he does sign it. He will doubtless speak of the Tariff Commission as a fact-finding and scientific body. It is to take up, on demand, tariff rates that are challenged, then decide if they should go up or down in accordance with an ascertained difference in "cost of production" between the United States and countries exporting goods to us. But this is merely the old Serbonian bog in which whole armies of tariff investigators have sunk. That basis of tariff legislation was sought, or pretended to be sought, long before a Tariff Commission was thought of. But nothing came of it. Very little has come of the endeavor of subsequent Tariff Commissions to make that method work. Almost the only triumph scored in the reduction of a rate was that on the importation of quail from Mexico. Not a signal lowering of the cost of living for Americans!

President HOOVER will presumably do his best to fill his new Tariff Commission with impartial experts. But if the ablest of them are sent to Europe, or have their agents go there, in order to determine the actual cost of production of goods sold to the United States, they will embark upon an endless and hopeless quest. Months or years will pass before any tariff duty of consequence can be altered through the machinery of the Tariff Commission, as it is blueprinted in the compromise report to be laid before the Senate tomorrow.

If the President is anxious to find the shortest and surest way to take the tariff out of politics, he might well consider vetoing a bill which has the trail of politics all over it. The measure, in the form in which it now bids fair to come to him for approval, is miles away from the kind of revision of the tariff which he pledged the country and urged upon Congress thirteen months ago. Politicians took the bill away from the President and shaped it after their hearts' desire. They made it one of the most glaringly political tariffs that we have ever had. In schedule after schedule, political considerations were allowed to determine the rate of duty. This was done partly by the usual logrolling. Included also was the offering of a definite political bribe to certain Democratic Senators, in the shape of tariff-rates supposed to be favorable to their particular States, in order to secure their support of the bill on final passage. There could be no more vicious kind of politics than this. But the only way now left to take the tariff bill out of it is to take it out and kill it.

The President cannot be ignorant of the fact that many leaders of American finance and industry are as anxious as he is to see the tariff taken out of politics. But their voices have been raised with surprising unanimity and strength against the bill as it stands. In it they see a great and continuous threat to our foreign commerce, and hence to our domestic prosperity. Never before, it is safe to say, have so many men of this class and weight spoken out, regardless of politics, in denunciation of a bill saturated with politics. If this measure were shot down in its tracks, the most effective way of taking the tariff out of politics for years to come would have been found.

A VICTORY FOR MR. BALDWIN

At the West Fulham by-election the Conservatives took a seat from Labor. It was a straight contest between the two parties. The Liberal candidate withdrew and advised his followers to vote against Socialism and all its works. The inability of the Labor Government to prevent the increase of unemployment seems to have been the main issue with the electors. There, as elsewhere, unemployment turned many minds toward safeguarding and the development of trade within the Empire as a possible alternative to the Socialist policy.

The defection of the Liberals was the most significant result at West Fulham. In Central Nottingham, which elected a Conservative to succeed a Conservative last week, there was a powerful local economic interest urgently committed to the Conservative side. Nottingham is a maker of embroideries and laces. For five years these have been safeguarded by an ad valorem duty of 33½ per cent against importations from Belgium, France and other countries. This tariff expires on June 30. Mr. SNOWDEN had given notice of its abolition. Early in May there was a great demonstration of workers in these industries. Mr. MACDONALD was asked to receive a deputation. Thus before the nominations were made the Conservatives must have been confident of success. Though few operatives vote in the Central Division, the threatened decline of an important industry was a real issue.

Mr. TERENCE O'CONNOR, the Conservative candidate, linked the fate of the threatened industry with that of others. Pottery, silk, gloves, cutlery, and so on, would have to go the way of lace and embroidery. Nearly 17,000 persons are employed in this industry. Wasn't there unemployment enough without throwing Nottingham men and women out of their jobs? Would any trade union leader say that he wanted English workmen to take such wages as are paid at Calais? Not only were those wages 40 per cent lower than those of Nottingham, but the French manufacturers didn't have to pay for pensions and other forms of social service. He used effectively the familiar arguments of protectionists here, "lower standards of living," "home markets flooded with cheap goods."

The free traders, divided into two camps, had no chance. The Labor nominee spurned every safeguarding except that of "the home of the consumer." Besides, safeguarding was only a stepping-stone to more protection. Some of his supporters advanced the ingenious theory that the Conservatives, by fixing the life of the duties at five years, were responsible for their coming removal. The Liberal candidate, elected in 1922 and 1923, was personally popular, but necessarily doomed to come in third. As compared with the vote at the general election last year, the Liberals lost almost 50 per cent, the Laborites nearly a third, while the Conservatives actually gained a few hundred. The victory was decided, but it was a three-cornered election.

Much might be argued from it, but prophecy is not a profitable art. What is clear is that Lord BEAVERBROOK had no share in the honors. Mr. O'CONNOR followed faithfully Mr. BALDWIN'S policy. He was the one safeguarder against two anti-safeguarders. Here is what he said of the Lord Crusader:

> Lord BEAVERBROOK advocates Empire free trade and wishes us here and now to impose food taxes in this country. Quite frankly, I do not agree with that policy. Let us see what decision the Imperial Conference arrives at and then put it to the referendum. Lord BEAVERBROOK is very energetic, and travels a little faster than public opinion.

INTERSTATE POWER.

Control of electric light and power transmitted across State lines is becoming a more and more lively issue. Interstate transmission now accounts for something like 11 per cent of the total generated. President HOOVER, long the champion of State regulation, has lately admitted that limited Federal jurisdiction may be necessary. One of the bills introduced in Congress by Senator COUZENS went so far in this direction that it brought down on his head the ire of the State commissioners generally throughout the country. Colonel DONOVAN, counsel to the recent special commission appointed to investigate the working of the public service law in New York, leans toward regulation by agreement between neighboring States; the commission itself passed the issue with a recommendation that it be made the subject of independent study.

So far, the argument has proceeded on two assumptions: that the States have no authority to regulate the rate at which power shall be sold in wholesale quantities beyond their own borders, and that the Federal Government could regulate if it chose to do so. The Attleboro case settled the first point and has been widely accepted as settling the second. "There can be no doubt that Congress, in the exercise of its superior power under the commerce clause of the Constitution, can step in and subject the whole field to detailed Federal regulation," says one authority. That contention, however, is now challenged by Mr. PAUL SHIPMAN ANDREWS of Syracuse, special counsel of New York State in waterpower matters. In a letter to THE TIMES appearing elsewhere today he questions the right of the Federal Government to go into the business of regulating electric light and power rates. He argues that a railroad rate differs from a power rate, since one is the price of transportation, while the other is the selling price of a commodity. "The Supreme Court has never held, and I think would hesitate to hold," he declares, "that the selling price of a commodity could be fixed simply because that commodity moved in interstate commerce."

The commerce clause, like the due process clause, has been treated a good deal like a rubber band. In the course of time it may be stretched still further. Nevertheless, Mr. ANDREWS'S argument is ingenious, and the States may seize upon it as a weapon against Federal intervention. If it is sound, then there is a No Man's Land in regulation which neither the Federal Government nor the States may enter. In the absence of Congressional legislation, such a No Man's Land undoubtedly exists today. Probably the only reason we have not heard more about it is that the utilities, not wishing to risk the alternative, are in no hurry to challenge State jurisdiction. Some way of closing the gap may yet be discovered. Assuming that State regulation is preferable to Federal, Professor DOWLING of Columbia read a paper at the recent meeting of the Academy of Political Science in this city, arguing that in spite of the Attleboro case Congress could, if it saw fit, remove the commerce clause obstacle at present standing in the way of complete control by the States.

WHEN LAFAYETTE WAS HERE

Kin of Marquis DE LAFAYETTE have come here on the first voyage of the steamship Lafayette. His secretary, M. LAVASSEUR, kept memories of his own triumphal return to America that suggest from what a primitive state we have risen in the century since. The vessel which brought him, the Cadmus, an American merchant ship, was a month and a day on its way before the "fresh verdure which adorns Staten Island" was perceived. A popular reception at the Battery amid the acclamation of two hundred thousand voices, an official reception at City Hall and a dinner at the City Hotel testify that our present ceremonial welcomes have eminent precedent.

Shortly after his arrival in New York he set out for Boston in a carriage, accompanied by a cavalcade of horsemen who rode with flaming torches by night. Five days and five nights were required to make the journey, for the carriage was frequently halted at the little towns along the way by "the moving and sublime displays of the gratefulness of the whole people." Most notable was New Haven, a town where there is "an institution of higher learning under the name of Yale College," with a president, four professors and six tutors, and with upward of four hundred students who were boarded for $2 a week, were required to be able to read the Greek testament and were given access to a library of 6,000 volumes, chiefly of theological books, which were added to at the rate of $200 worth of books a year.

At Cambridge, the seat of Harvard College, LAFAYETTE attended Commencement, which "was conducted with pomp," and a meeting of the "Hellenic Society" (probably the Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa), where EDWARD EVERETT, then a young tutor, made an oration in which he discussed the particular causes which contributed most to the "development of intelligence" in the United States. The French chronicler took a much more favorable view of our culture at that period than could be gathered from the English reviews. In one of these it was said that ages must pass before America could find either leisure or inclination for the study of BACON or NEWTON, that FRANKLIN was our only philosopher whose discoveries had been of use to mankind, and that if all the books ever written in the United States were set on fire tomorrow no scholar would miss them. SYDNEY SMITH had even more contemptuously said in The Edinburgh Review:

> In the four quarters of the globe, who reads an American book or goes to an American play or looks at an American picture or statue? What does the world owe to American physicians or surgeons? What new substances have chemists discovered or what old ones have they analyzed? What new constellations have they discovered by the telescopes of America? What have they done to mathematics? Who drinks out of American glasses? or eats out of American plates? or wears American coats or gowns or sleeps in American blankets?

LAFAYETTE'S secretary was discovering at that same time, and at first hand, evidences of a zest for education and a provision comparable with that of Europe. Though the inhabitants are "ardently occupied in all sorts of industry," they do not neglect those studies which "form the taste and enlarge the intellect." He based this statement on observations in several cities where he found scientific, philosophical and literary societies and incipient museums.

On his return to New York LAFAYETTE made another journey northward, going to West Point, Newburgh, Poughkeepsie, Albany and Troy by boat, which "despite its steam engine" traveled at the rate of only six miles an hour. Again returning, he was given a crowning welcome, before his departure for the South and West, at a culminating function of which The Evening Post said: "We hazard nothing in saying that it was the most magnificent fête given under sever in the world." The nearest approach to our modern "movies" was shown at its close—a "transparency" in which WASHINGTON and LAFAYETTE, in picture, stood holding each other by the hand before an altar of liberty.

In the fleet which now crosses the Atlantic there is fittingly a ship that bears the name of one who risked his all for an alien land struggling for independence.

MOSCOW LEARNS AND TEACHES.

The president of the Great Northern Railroad is the latest in the long list of foreign experts to whom the Soviet Government has turned for help. Mr. BUDD will devote three months to laying the basis for reorganization of the Russian railways. Sailing with him is a Soviet railway commission which has been pursuing its education in this country. The professed enemies of capitalism at Moscow have made a temporary religion of the methods of capitalism as successfully pursued in the United States. The avowed purpose is to learn from the United States in order ultimately to overthrow the economic ideals for which the United States stands. But for the time being FORD and EDISON and Taylorization and mechanization are almost hallowed words in Soviet Russia. American engineers are developing the Soviet Government's electrification projects and building its tractor factories. On the morrow of the Bolshevist seizure of power, LENIN informed his followers that to survive they must learn "to trade." The Communist leaders since then have widened the injunction. They are out to learn how to manufacture, raise crops, trade and bank efficiently. For efficiency they turn to the Western world of capitalism and in particular to this country.

The Soviet Government at present is learning; some day it expects to teach the world. The lesson it hopes to inculcate is the superior efficiency of Socialist production. The mission of the Soviet Government is to vindicate production for service as against production for profit. If ever Moscow demonstrates that her new communal methods can provide more goods and satisfactions and opportunities than private enterprise, the effect upon the nations will obviously be profound. If Socialism "works" in Russia, the capitalistic nations will have to look to themselves. But the responsible leaders at Moscow know that the date for reading the lesson to capitalism is still far off. For many years the Communist régime must be content to go to school to the exploiting nations. Russia still has a great deal to learn about building factories and power plants, constructing the necessary machinery, transporting the raw material, and turning out the finished product at a profit. Moscow makes no secret of the fact that it is still in the stage of mastering output. Profits are in the future.

Not so modest in their claims are foreign sympathizers of Soviet Russia, who find that Communism is already in a position to teach the world. But when the subjects of instruction are listed, they usually impress one as strikingly non-Russian. Much is said and written about what Soviet Russia is doing in the matter of schools, of public health, of social insurance, of workers' protection. The earnestness with which these things are emphasized occasionally suggests that the speaker has never heard of such things as unemployment insurance, maternity benefits, old-age pensions, sickness and accident insurance outside of Russia. The rest-homes provided for sick workers in Russia are advertised to a reading public which is apparently not acquainted with the fact that industrial England has cut her mortality rate nearly in half in a generation. The things which today we are asked to learn from Soviet Russia have been familiar in the capitalistic West for many years. Russia's real lesson for the world is still to come.

AUDIENCE WITHOUT GROUP MIND.

Almost every one who has listened over the radio will agree that ten minutes is long enough for most speeches. This is one of the rules laid down by Mr. SHERMAN P. LAWTON of the University of Michigan in his article on "The Principles of Effective Radio Speaking," in The Quarterly Journal of Speech. The general rule, most tactfully put, is "a radio speaker should talk only so long as he is talking interestingly and well on a subject calculated to hold attention." The corollary is, "This may in some cases exceed ten or fifteen minutes." Perhaps many orators think they belong in the exceptional class, but the professor goes on with a blow for that belief. If a speaker is a Presidential candidate, or otherwise very well known, he may take liberties with the time of his radio audience. As for trying to hold them with jokes, that hope is dashed too. A speaker should never incorporate witticisms in his remarks unless he is listed on the program as a humorist.

A radio audience cannot see how funny the speaker looks, even if he is a professional comedian with all his war-paint on. As JOE COOK says: "On the stage I can juggle with balls, bottles, ladders, musical instruments. On radio I can juggle only with my voice." The radio speaker is also handicapped by the disparateness of his audience. It is not a crowd with a group mind. Something that will make an individual laugh aloud when he is a member of a crowd that is amused will hardly bring a smile when he is alone The mood of an audience in a theatre makes some innuendos and puns acceptable, while the individual listener, without the support of congenial amusement-seekers, may be bored or even offended.

Discovering from numerous questionnaires that radio speeches are "none too popular" at best, Mr. LAWTON points out the necessity of taking pains to profit by criticisms from listeners. Many have complained that speeches are too "highbrow." Speakers are told that they should assume the intelligence of the general public to be that of a 12-year-old child. One studio has hung in a prominent place a picture of Mrs. Blank of Blank Street, a workingman's wife, with her babies. She is there to remind all performers that they are directing their entertainment or instruction at her.

Because it is as yet impossible to reproduce or receive the sound of "th" and "s" perfectly, speakers are advised to substitute "crime" for "lawlessness" and "gratitude" for "thanks." One announcer was embarrassed because he neglected this rule. Broadcasting an annual convention at a large hotel, he told his audience that the grand ballroom was all filled with booths. That seemingly innocent last word came out "booze," to the delight of some listeners and the fury of some "booth-holders."

REGISTERING THE WRONG ALIENS.

The most conclusive argument against Senator BLEASE'S bill for the "voluntary" registration of aliens is that it could not achieve its purpose. This is not, as some opponents have insisted, to place an unfair restriction on aliens who have entered this country lawfully, but to help weed out those who have entered the country illegally. It is obvious that any who have been "bootlegged" into the country would never apply for a registration certificate. Since full records of lawful entries are kept in the Immigration Bureau, there is no incentive for them to seek further identification cards.

A part of the opposition to this measure has been somewhat hysterical, conjuring up pictures of the establishment in this country of an oppressive system such as is said to have existed in Russia. So also the arguments that the plan would place in the hands of employers a tyrannical power over alien employes are largely imaginary, and are put forward in terms of pre-war Europe rather than of present-day America.

The truth is that it is desirable for all concerned to have some sort of check-up which will help to discourage aliens from entering the country illegally. Complete and compulsory registration might help to do this. Voluntary registration could not. More effective than either method would be the establishment of stricter border patrols and more effective supervision of the various feasible points of entry along the coast. To sift out those already in the country unlawfully would be a hard task. Better concentrate on cutting down the number of future "bootlegged" immigrants.

In the closing days of the session Congress often passes bills with scant consideration. In case the Blease bill gets by, it is safe to consider it as innocuous. Certainly the fears of many who oppose it would not be realized. It is at best a weak measure, and not the engine of tyranny and oppression which its opponents have sought to make of it. It ought to be left in the session's unfinished business.

THE "60-CENT DOLLAR."

The recent downward readjustment of prices in this country bids fair to introduce confusion in one familiar bit of phraseology. Reference to "the 60-cent dollar" has done long service in describing the higher cost of living since the war. That there was no such thing as a 60-cent dollar in America did not prevent even usually careful thinkers from adopting the expression. People reasonably familiar with the facts were aware that it was only another way of saying that prices, on the average, had been ranging somewhere around 60 per cent above the pre-war level. Probably there was a fairly large body of citizens who imagined that something had happened to the dollar itself; that, somehow, we had had our share of the currency depreciation which cut so important a figure in European countries during and shortly after the war. This fact suggested that the "60-cent dollar" idea was possibly mischievous, as it was certainly foolish.

Of late, the accuracy of the phrase, even as a figure of speech, has been seriously shaken. The economists have mercifully drawn a veil over the recent change; the index numbers of average prices, which used to be based on "1913 as par," are nowadays mostly based on 1926, but with results which may be confusing to the multitude. On the old base, Professor FISHER'S index number for 1925, for instance, was 159¼; which, by the usual process of inversion, implied a "62⅞-cent dollar." Now, however, it is 88⅝, which establishes a dollar of 113¼ cents on the rating of 1926. Nor is this all; for even if the puzzled inquirer translates the present index number into the former terms of "1913 parity" and proceeds to appraise the currency accordingly, he will find that we are living nowadays under something like a 74-cent dollar.

Perhaps the whole problem would be simplified if people were to confine themselves to language which describes what has actually happened. In the wild commodity speculation of 1920, prices in the United States, by the government's calculation, went 147 per cent above the immediate pre-war average. In the sweeping reaction of 1921 and 1922, they fell to a point only 38 per cent above "pre-war." In 1925 the difference averaged nearly 60 per cent; now it is approximately 35 per cent. What it will be a year from now is a matter of guesswork. The one certainty is that we have today no "60-cent dollar," whether actually or constructively.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

Bank Solves Gas Problem. Forced to secure its loans by purchasing the property of the Linton Gas Company at a receiver's sale, the First National Bank of Linton, Ind., found itself in a strange predicament. Of 1,300 original consumers of gas, 270 remained to insist on their right to service. The bank might well have been pardoned had it sold the property for what it would bring. Instead it cast about for a method of satisfying the few customers and of building up the utility. The result is something so technically new in gas-making that it may have a bearing on the waste natural gas that invariably accompanies the exploitation of oil fields.

The old Linton Gas Company supplied manufactured gas. The bank decided to sell butane, a liquid obtained by compressing natural gas. Oklahoma supplied the butane. After it had been shipped to Linton in tank cars the butane was reconverted into gas by mixing it with air. The twice metamorphosed gas was then piped to Linton's 270 consumers. Not only did Linton like its new gas (it burned with a hotter flame than the old), but the bank found it unnecessary to operate much expensive gas-producing machinery.

Having demonstrated how a small community can be economically and satisfactorily supplied with gas, the bank sold its ideas and its gas business to a utility company. And now gas engineers are wondering whether the difficult problem of supplying small towns with gas has not been solved because a bank protected itself at a receiver's sale.

Exit the Film Star. How complete is the severance between the new speaking film and the old silent picture is seen in the announcement by one of the leading producers that no longer will any actor be designated as the picture's star. That the move is radical is obvious, in view of the fact that from the days of its infancy the moving-picture industry has depended on and revolved around the star. MARY PICKFORD, DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS, RUDOLPH VALENTINO—it scarcely seems credible that the star can "set."

The producer referred to states that henceforth the acting organizations will be gigantic stock companies. Individuals may cease to be stars in the organization and yet receive prominence in the electric signs. The advertising departments will be on the alert, and on any falling off in attendance will not hesitate to blazon forth any name that will serve as a magnet to recover the faithful.

The very fact that speech added on the screen compels the motion-picture industry to become more and more closely allied with the theatre, both in method and personnel, lends color to the theory that what has worked in the theatre will work in the picture field.

Booths for Frontiersmen. Foreigners who visit these shores, and particularly those who make the trip from shore to shore, are greatly impressed by the magnificent distances of the West. They get the idea that Westerners revel in great open spaces and are children of the wide outdoors. But this is only a quaint superstition.

Californians dote on small shut-in spaces, snug nooks and corners. This is obvious from the prevalence of booths in every sort of restaurant. Whether you go to a fish grotto or a grill or a French restaurant or a "coffee pot," you find it filled with booths. The fact that the restaurateur provides booths is often advertised on his front window. Not until every booth is occupied do the clients resign themselves to coming out in the open and dining at a table unsheltered by protecting walls.

The booth itself is any sort of three-sided screen. Its walls may be low or from floor to ceiling, gayly painted or luxuriously upholstered. The booth idea perhaps originated in the frontiersman's fondness for making a stand with his back to the wall. A booth gives him the choice of three. An Englishman's home may be his castle, but a San Franciscan's sanctuary is a booth.

The English Nightingale's Song. Americans headed for England may be glad to hear that this is a "nightingale year." Never were the birds more numerous or so full of song.

Hark! ah, the nightingale.
The tawny-throated!
Hark, from that moonlit cedar what a burst!
What triumph! Hark! What pain!

"In the early days of his arrival," says a newspaper naturalist, "you may follow the technique of his distribution, and you will never again hear songs quite like the earliest, though you may hear much better ones." A clump of furze or thorn is a good place to hear rival nightingales, for they sing against each other. They pour out their melodies in spite of the moving lights and the din of automobiles.

In the country north of London, nightingales are thick this season. Yet more of them are to be heard in the counties south and southwest of London. One is sure to come upon them in the valley of the Thames or of the Wye. American naturalists have contended that our brown thrasher, a thrush, is a more brilliant performer than the nightingale, and that the strains of the wood thrush and the hermit thrush are sweeter.

A POET'S CREDO.

(John Masefield, born June 1, 1878.)

I have desired Beauty all my days,
Deeming it higher wisdom to go nude
Of all the brazen pomps and panoplies;
Knowing the hyssop and the gnarlèd
rood
To be the seal of her celestial pence,
Her very name and sign. So I have spent
This blood and bone, the old inheritance,
This sight and brawn, to follow where she went.

I have not cared because men shrug and smile
And lift the eye and say, "The fool is mad
To shadow Beauty mile on weary mile."
Lean with a passion they have never had
I seek the sum of life and love and death—
A sword, a song, a breath of Beauty's breath.

BY-PRODUCTS.

The Buyer Need Not Beware.

My Dear Constant Reader: That certainly is an amusing slip of the pen right at the beginning of your letter. Speaking of the recent ruling by the Supreme Court that it is not unlawful to buy and possess liquor, you ask what does By-Products think about this serious setback to Prohibition. But of course you didn't intend to say "serious setback." You meant "notable victory," didn't you? Like every other intelligent reader, you saw like a shot that the Supreme Court rendered magnificent service to the prohibition laws when it made it safe for everybody to get a drink.

Imagine, dear C. R., what would have happened if the Supreme Court had decided the other way. If the customer had been made equally guilty with the bootlegger, it would have meant just one thing. Millions of citizens who are now merely discontented with Prohibition would rise up and make an end of the Prohibition laws. The people who drafted the Eighteenth Amendment knew what they were about when they refused to prohibit the buying and drinking of liquor along with the making, transporting and selling. If drinking had been expressly forbidden, the amendment would never have passed. And that, we imagine, is what the Supreme Court had in mind. It recognized that the only way to keep Prohibition is to permit people to drink.

In this sense the Prohibition system is just one more instance in the long list of compromises by which the American people, beginning with a Constitution that is full of compromises, has managed to get on so well. Those of us who want Prohibition written into the law of the land have their laws, and those of us who want our drink have their drink, and that is why the last ten years were the most prosperous in our history. This country simply grows fat on the process of passing laws and nullifying them. You often hear people deplore the fact that the American people are deprived of freedom of movement by a written Constitution. They point to England, where the Constitution at any moment is what Parliament chooses to make it, and consequently the people can do what they please.

But what this argument overlooks is that when the English people pass a law they obey it, whereas when we add an amendment to the Constitution we nullify it. To speak of the English being freer than we are is absurd. They insist upon obeying a law even when it is a thousand years old, while our laws break down before they are enacted. The English observe the law of the year 1243 which makes the Corporation of London the owner of every cygnet or male swan born on the upper reaches of the Thames with a black feather in its wings. The English obey the law of presumbaly the year 876 which bestows a flitch of bacon on every married couple which has lived together a year without quarreling. The English scrupulously obey the law of, we suppose, the year 300 B. C., which makes it obligatory for Englishmen to have brussels sprouts for dinner seven days a week. But in this country we refuse to obey the laws against homicide.

Isn't it odd, C. R., how people will grieve over Americans being so dreadfully standardized and regimented and coerced, and in the same breath call us the most lawless people on earth? It seems hardly fair. Worse than that, it really shows no understanding of the American mentality. Critics ask in what other country are so many laws passed for the purpose of making people good or wise or beautiful or rich against their own will; and they call such procedure coercion and standardization and tyranny. Well, so it would be tyranny if the laws so passed were also enforced. Of course, the people in favor of such a law would be rather pleased than not if it could be enforced, but the essential thing is to get the law on the statute books.

Now you mustn't think, my dear C. R., that the preceding lines are intended for irony. Neither is the process described above quite as silly as it sounds. What, you will ask, is the sense of passing laws if you are not particularly keen about seeing them enforced? Well, the answer is that with us a law does not mean precisely what it means in other countries. In other countries a law is passed for the sole purpose of being obeyed. With us the enactment of a law is only the formulation of an ideal. It is an aspiration which in the course of time will really take form, but we are willing to wait. We have laws against homicide, but if the United States cannot get along without 10,000 murders a year, why, we can only hope for better times, in the meanwhile keeping anti-homicide laws on the books, but not forcing matters by seriously attempting to punish anybody for murder. We have laws stating that candidates must not spend too much money in primary campaigns for the United States Senate. But if candidates insist on spending half a million dollars, we can only wait for the years to roll by and politicians to see the light, in the meanwhile keeping the laws on the books and not enforcing them but just pointing the way.

That is the meaning of the Prohibition laws. To a great many American men and women they are primarily the statement of an ideal, and only secondarily laws to be obeyed now. It would be very pleasant indeed if they were actually obeyed in the year 1930. But if not, why, one can wait for the years to roll by and the present stiff-necked generation to perish from the face of the earth, and a new generation to grow up that knew not pre-Volstead, and a new generation after that, and so for perhaps a couple of hundred years until the enforcement of the Prohibition ideal becomes quite feasible. In the meanwhile the principal consideration is to keep the flag flying—that is to say, to keep Prohibition on the statute books. And that is why it is better to keep the laws on the books by allowing people to drink, rather than to deprive them of drink and so endanger the Prohibition laws.

THEY SAY—

By STANLEY BALDWIN,
Ex-Premier of Britain.
On being installed as Chancellor of St. Andrew's University.

THE essential virtue, if you are to make anything of your life, is dilligence; it does not matter what word you choose if you understand what you mean by it. Concentration, industry, hard work, are all synonymous, or, if you like to draw on the vocabulary of the street, "plugging" or "sticking it" will give you the essential meaning with less elegance but more vigor.

Diligence seems so commonplace that when we see a great accomplishment of learning, of discovery, in statesmanship, in what you will, we are always inclined to attribute it to genius, to good fortune, to anything and everything except that very power of concentration and continuous work which is its very foundation.

And this belief is sometimes fostered by a human weakness not unknown among those who have dazzled the eyes of their own contemporaries. There is a temptation to make men believe that your success is due less to that capacity for work which is to be found in every position of life than to some innate superiority which has predestined you from the beginning to do, in a fit of absence of mind, as it were, what can only be accomplished by others, if indeed it can be accomplished at all, by the unceasing labor of a lifetime. • • •

There is one unfailing source to which we can go when we want truth, common sense, wisdom. Let me remind you of Dr. Johnson's answer to Boswell on the subject we are considering. They were speaking of literary composition, and Boswell asked him very naturally whether one should wait for the favorable moment, for the afflatus, before beginning to write. "No, sir," said Johnson, "he should sit down doggedly." And that is how all the work best worth doing has been and will be done.

By SIR JAMES BARRIE,
On his seventieth birthday, at the annual dinner of the Royal Literary Fund.

NOT for years and years have I written anything, and it is rather sad to know that nobody seems to have noticed this except myself. Of course, I don't notice things much nowadays. I can't find my way about even among my own characters. • • •

The characters we think we "create." That is surely the most comic word in an author's vocabulary. The heroine, of course, is the worst one. Very obedient until she gets into your book, but you are a lucky writer if in a week thereafter you know her by sight. You may have taken the greatest pains with the woman, tearing her open, and then find her being quite civil to her father. It's heartbreaking. You meant her to be a real woman.

Those were the women in my notebooks, stern exposures of themselves, Jill the Rippers. It would scarify you to hear what I intended my Jills to divulge about their rhythms. But did they do it? No; they disregarded me and remained—respectable. • • •

Have you ever seen a lion at the zoo unable to chase from his cage a mob of sparrows? I have sometimes thought that children and fairies are my sparrows, and that I am that badgered lion. I came to the decision, and it is also open to you, that no author should ever write anything. I tried the drama. I felt that there might be some chance in it for my beloved Modernism. But the more I was behind the scenes the less Modernism did there seem to be. • • • There was but one course open to me. I disappeared from literature, and for a pocketful of years I have lived serenely in my new delightful calling.

By NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER,
President of Columbia University and the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace,
In a statement to the press on arriving from a ten weeks' trip abroad.

EUROPE is growing, and growing rapidly, into a new and unaccustomed frame of mind and into a new and unaccustomed international relationship. • • • Everybody lost the war and nobody won it. That fact is pretty universally accepted, and the men of light and leading do not propose to have another war to lose. • • •

They do not propose to have another world-wide conflagration set going by another pistol shot at any Sarajevo or by any bomb thrown by a casual disturber of the peace. • • •

A good many persons, particularly in Germany and in Italy, appear to look upon the years 1930 and 1931 as crucial for Russia. More than once the opinion was expressed that during those years the revolutionary economic system of the Soviets will either break down or sufficiently strengthen itself to forecast a considerably prolonged existence. In view of these important expressions of opinion, it has been arranged that the trustees of the Carnegie Endowment shall be put in confidential possession of the most complete information obtainable concerning Russia during the next few months. • • •

Mussolini has endowed Italy and the Italian people with a new sense of youth. They are young in spirit, young in feeling, young in ambition and young in enthusiasm. They wish to sit again in the seats of the mighty and to be hailed and looked upon as one of the great intellectual and political forces of the modern world. • • •

Public opinion would almost everywhere sustain a much quicker and sharper reduction of expenditures upon armaments than the governments themselves seem at present ready to make. The chief reason for this is to be found in their fear, left over from an older way of thinking in international affairs, that a government would lose prestige if it were to reduce its armaments below those of some neighboring nation. This consideration would seem more suitable to children playing in a back yard than to governments charged with the responsibility for the peace of the world.

By CALVIN COOLIDGE,
Former President of the United States,
In an address at the tercentennial at Watertown, the ancestral Massachusetts home of the Coolidges.

THE earliest ancestor who bore my family name was one of the original settlers of this town. The chairman has told you where his burial place is; John and Mary Coolidge rest there, having lived for nearly sixty years after arriving in 1630 in this locality. During my service at the State House, oftentimes I came to those graves and found consolation there, remembering that if I had some troubles and difficulties they were very small compared with the sacrifices and hardships they and their associates had to undergo.

They were a people who knew how to think for themselves and how to act for themselves, and these qualities they extended from their religious life to their political life because it was through their belief in that respect that they laid here the foundations for a free government.

We must remember that not only do we owe a debt of gratitude to those who came here 300 years ago but we owe an equal debt to the long line of people who have been coming here ever since that day.

By WINSTON CHURCHILL,
Former Chancellor of the British Exchequer,
In a House of Commons discussion of a proposal to reduce the tax on beer.

I KNOW Lady Astor's views. But what astonishes me is that she should persist with unabated—one might almost say unabashed—consistency to the reiteration of those views in the face of the ghastly muddle which has been made in her own country in the treatment of the drink trade.

The sooner the noble lady clears her mind of these misconceptions, the sooner will she be able to take not only a useful but a well-informed part in our discussion. • • •

Lady Astor is as wrong as the difference between night and day in charging that remission of the beer tax would put the profits in the brewers' pockets.

Even if it were true, it would be far preferable that they should gain the profit than that it should be reaped, as it is in another country, by bootleggers. From whomever the House takes it guidance on this question, it ought not take it from the noble lady who does not represent at all the view held by the people of these islands.

By C. WILLIAM RAMSEYER,
Member of Congress from Iowa,
In debating the resolution to investigate Communist propaganda in education.

EVERY now and then people get alarmed about something and start out to investigate or to hunt something or to chase somebody. Two or three hundred years ago up in Massachusetts they hunted witches. They not only hunted them but they burned them. As long as they hunted witches they found them. When they quit hunting witches the witches ceased to exist. This seems to be a kind of a witch-hunting expedition, to see whether there is anybody in this country that should be destroyed, or whether there is somebody in this country trying to destroy us.

I do not know whether there is a necessity for such investigation. We do not hear much about such things out in the Middle West. • • • If there is anybody in this country who is seeking to overthrow the government by force or organize a revolution against the government he should be placed where he can do no harm. • • • There are great economic problems before this country that we should face frankly and squarely, and one reason why I am against this resolution, unless very strong reason therefor exists, is that I do not want anything to distract the minds of the people from the great economic problems with which we are confronted. • • • When we have the most of everything, we encounter a panic, and then we have the greatest number of people without food, without clothing and without shelter. An economic and industrial system that permits that, ladies and gentlemen of this House, has something wrong with it. Instead of going out and looking up the Communists of the country, which the State and national authorities can now look after, this Congress had better create a committee to study the reasons for unemployment in this country and the cause and cure of business slumps.

By WALTER E. EDGE,
American Ambassador to France,
In a speech to the American Chamber of Commerce in Paris.

THERE is a problem of international economics which I feel is perhaps the Gordian knot of commercial exchange today; that is the formidable overproduction in certain industrial and agricultural staples, and particularly raw materials, which has characterized the last decade in many countries. • • •

Until a healthy influence is erected toward balancing production there will continue to be barriers to a perfect commercial understanding, and an unmarketable surplus will mount up with the attendant economic waste and financial loss. We should realize the fundamental fact that the market is just as important as production, and the corollary that production when there is nobody to buy is economically disastrous. • • •

To us, as we look on economics from the background of the last decade, it has been becoming increasingly evident for some time that there has been and still is a problem of abnormal output. • • •

FOOTNOTES ON A WEEK'S HEADLINES

The Gobi Calls Again.

ONCE he scrubbed the floor of the American Museum of Natural History; now he compels that institution to add to its floor space to house the trophies he brings to it. Even prosaic science, even painstaking anthropology, has its Horatio Alger stories.

Roy Chapman Andrews has again left for the Gobi Desert and what many believe is the cradle of the human race. If it is a cradle, it's a rocky one; therein is its scientific advantage. For most of the specimens such explorers as Andrews seek there are petrified. If they were not turned to stone they would have been dust long before the Egyptians began building pyramids. These petrified objects are literally millions of years old. Perhaps the most spectacular of all finds made by Mr. Andrews in the Gobi Desert were some rounded objects like huge pebbles—dinosaur eggs, millions of years old and petrified, perhaps the hardest boiled eggs in the world.

Mr. Andrews came to New York early in the century, a young man from Beloit. He had grown up in that Wisconsin college town, had attended college there, but his spare time had been almost entirely occupied by taxidermy and the reading of any book upon zoology and paleontology he could get his hands on. His idea of heaven was the Natural History Museum in New York and his idea of the gods were the men who worked there. Andrews would be a god, too, but the museum had all the taxidermists it needed. "Let me wash your floors," Andrews pleaded. He would have put stove polish on the great meteor in the entrance hall and rubbed it off every morning if by so doing he could work in the museum.

The result was that the next morning Andrews went to work with pail and mop. A few months later he was given his first chance at taxidermy—as assistant to a man who was stuffing a whale's carcass for exhibition. Hitherto Andrews's experience with stuffing animals had been with such monsters as squirrels and badgers; now he was making good in the city in a big way. After stuffing whales young Mr. Andrews became a member of an expedition to catch and study them in their ocean homes. He became an expert on whales, but also he came to the attention of museum officials as a capable field man. Other people are doing the floors now; perhaps one or two took the job so that they might see Roy Chapman Andrews.

City Names Are Changing.

THE Welch town of Llanairpwllewyndyllgogerywchwyr n g r o b wrllandysiliogogogoch has not changed it name, but Constantinople is now officially known as Istanbul. Last week the American State Department took cognizance of the change, in accordance with the policy of always observing legal names of places in foreign countries.

Peking has changed its name not once but twice in recent months. For a time the Nationalist group, which had its capital in Nanking, called it Peiping. There was an excellent reason for this. Peking means northern capital, while Peiping means merely northern outpost.

There have been many changes in European town names since the war and many of the new names have been in the nature of revivals. Christiania has tried to forget that King Christian IV of Denmark founded the city in the seventeenth century, and in order to do so has gone back to the name of the settlement that stood there long before—Oslo. Queenstown, Ireland, is once more Cobh, and Brest Litovsk has become even less pronounceable as Brzesc nad Bugiem.

Russia—or rather Soyuz Sovetskikh Socialisticheskikh Respublik—is in a class supremely by itself in current ventures to call everything something else. The St. Petersburg-Petrograd-Leningrad shift is now as familiar as that other triple play, Tinker to Evers to Chance. Alexandropol is Leninakan, Elizabethgrad is Zinovievsk and Simbirsk is Ulyanovsk, according to the happy plan of naming a town in honor of each of the more prominent comrades.

Meantime, English people who have for generations quietly resented the names of their own villages continue with true British fortitude to endure them. Rotten End is still Rotten End, Ugley Green is still Ugley Green, and Swineside is still Swineside. But there are signs of revolt. Last Winter the people who inhabit what is now Buxworth decided that they had had enough. Henceforth, they decided, they would try to forget that their town had once been known far and wide by the curiously unappealing name of Bugsworth.

Byng of the Police.

LONDON, like New York, has her Police Commissioners returning from Southern vacations to deny rumors of their resignations; and London, like New York, has had her police scandals which brought in a new commissioner to ginger up the force.

After this statement all comparison ends between Grover Whalen and Viscount Byng of Vimy, who has just returned from a five months' vacation in South Africa and says that he will not resign. For Lord Byng's background is the British Army, whereas Mr. Whalen's military career began and ended at Clason Point. Nor was it an unsolved murder mystery like the Rothstein affair that brought the victor at Vimy to Scotland Yard, but a case of alleged petting in Hyde Park. A knight and a typist were arrested on a park bench. Their protests reached Parliament, police feared to make any more arrests in the parks, with the result that conditions in Hyde Park became a public scandal.

Byng was summoned to Scotland Yard to restore public confidence in the London police. One of his first tasks was to deal with night clubs and police corruption—a not unfamiliar condition in New York. A police sergeant was found with $90,000 extorted from London resorts operating after closing hours, and from this might be drawn the moral that, given the same temptations and the same lack of resistance, a bobby is a cop and a cop is a bobby.

Lord Byng once commanded an army of 300,000 men. His perplexities have been as great while heading 20,000 London police. In Flanders he ordered many a trench raid. From Scotland Yard he set in motion many a raid upon night resorts with similar aggravating results.

When he was 38 Lord Byng might have retired from the army a Colonel on half pay and spent the subsequent thirty years crying "Tallyho" and acquiring gout and a high blood pressure. Instead, he led a cavalry division in the "Old Contemptibles" and became in turn Corps Commander of the Canadians and then head of the Third British Army. After the war he became Viscount Vimy and representative of the King as Governor General of Canada. So far as honors go, supervising a few thousand London bobbies could bring him no more. But Lord Byng received his honors because of a life-long habit. In high-sounding phrases this habit is "the call of duty." In less pompous language the habit is "keeping on the job." Both phrases mean the same.

Pluto Gets a Planet.

BECAUSE Pluto was the god of the dark regions, his name has been given by the Lowell Observatory star-gazers to their new and mysterious Planet X. Thus justice is done to a most important old deity who has been sadly neglected by astronomy.

Pluto was a son of Saturn (Cronus) and a brother of Jupiter and Neptune. Saturn had a reprehensible way of swallowing his children, so his sons suppressed him and divided the family kingdom by lot. Jupiter took the air, Neptune the sea, and Pluto the lower world of darkness and death.

Pitiless, deaf to prayer or praise was Pluto. His first name, Hades, was a perilous thing to speak. Worse yet, he kept a three-headed dog, Cerberus. Yet Pluto was not entirely hard-boiled. When Venus incited Cupid to sting him with an arrow, he fell in love with beautiful Prosperpine, daughter of Ceres, and carried her off to Tartarus to be his wife. And when Orpheus went to Tartarus to beg for the life of his dead Eurydice, Pluto's heart was melted by the musician's song.

As men grow civilized, so do their gods. In the course of time Pluto lost his cruelty and became beneficent. Because grain and minerals came out of his dark jurisdiction underneath the earth, he was at last regarded as the giver of wealth and the patron god of plutocracy.

His last picture shows him as an amiable fellow, carrying a horn of plenty and armed with nothing worse than a two-pronged spear, which a little imagination readily turns into a garden fork.

Compassionate in Victory.

A BETTER pension than the government allowance of $50 a month has been asked for the aged widow of a naval hero whose name rang through the world in the days of the Spanish-American War. Representative La Guardia's bill in behalf of Mrs. John W. Philip brings to memory a most thrilling day in the history of the navy.

On Sunday, July 3, 1898, the American fleet lay watching off Santiago de Cuba where Cervera's warships were hiding. On board the battleship Texas Captain Philip saw the first of the Spanish ships putting out of the harbor and ran up the signal, "Enemy ships escaping." Commodore Schley, on the Brooklyn, signaled, "Close in," and the battle was on.

Westward went the Spaniards, the Texas racing in chase, pounding them with her guns. "Then occurred an incident," said Captain Philip afterward, "which caused me more alarm than anything Cervera did that day." The battle smoke was thick. "We might as well have had a blanket tied over our heads. Suddenly a whiff of breeze lifted the pall and there, bearing toward us and across our bows, great clouds of black smoke pouring from her funnels, was the Brooklyn."

It was the Brooklyn's famous loop, executed to baffle the concentrated fire of the Spaniards, but at great risk to the Texas, which had to reverse her engines and fight her own speed, letting the Iowa and the Oregon pass her and take the lead in the pursuit.

By noon the Spanish ships were destroyed. The Texas had disposed of the Oquendo, above whose burning and sinking hull the white flag ran up. The sailors of the Texas gave voice to wild shouts of triumph. Then Captain Philip uttered the words that history will never forget: "Don't cheer, men," he said. "The poor devils are dying."

FACTS

WORLD trade increased between 1921 and 1928 from $43,000,000,000 to $68,000,000,000, Great Britain's share of the increase being $3,000,000,000 and America's $2,000,000,000.

Germany's government-owned railroad is the world's largest and carries annually more than twice as many passengers as all American first-class roads together.

New York City handles more than 50 per cent of the business done by all of the 236 bank clearing houses in the country, the weight of checks in one day often reaching two tons.

In a decade horses and mules have decreased on farms to an extent that releases 18,000,000 acres formerly used for growing their feed.

Radio, traveling 186,000 miles per second, would reach the new planet Pluto in 6 hours 14 minutes.

In gasoline consumption one airplane is equivalent to forty automobiles.

Retail credit records show that less than four-tenths of 1 per cent is lost on charge accounts, meaning that 99 out of 100 Americans are honest.

Silver dollars, in metal value, are now worth less than one-third their face value.

American ships in 1928 carried 31.6 per cent of United States foreign sea-borne trade on a tonnage basis, tanker cargoes excluded.

DOMINION STATUS AS GOAL OF INDIA

Commander Kenworthy of British Parliament Tells of the Obstacles He Found There

By J. M. KENWORTHY, M. P.

LONDON.

IT is difficult for the Westerner to appreciate the meaning of events in India and the situation that has arisen unless the position taken up by the most prominent of the Indian leaders is understood, together with the influence they wield and the reactions of the mass of the people to their teaching. It has been well said that the British in India have been like the crew of a ship sailing on the surface of deep waters, unconscious of the movements and stirrings below.

It was in order to examine into the real situation, and especially what Napoleon used to call the imponderables, that I revisited India this last Spring after a twenty years' absence. While there I had opportunities of conferences, discussions and personal conversations with representative Indian leaders of every section and with prominent English officials, senior army officers and experienced business men. I am the last British Parliamentarian who has been in India for this purpose and the last to have speech with the leaders of the Indian national movement. And I was put in possession of all the facts and information I required.

The first fact to be appreciated is that there is no "India" in the sense that we speak of the United States of America, of Australia or even of Europe. That is to say, there is no homogeneous population with the same ideas and outlook on affairs. In India there are over a score of principal languages and even more separate and independent races. Though Hinduism is the predominant religious and social system, the Hindus themselves are divided up into many distinct sects, castes, classes and even races. A Brahmin is usually fairer in color than a low-caste Hindu, and centuries of differentiation have created a gulf between them, the width and depth of which it is difficult for any non-Indian to appreciate.

Caste System Survives.

There is a students' movement to bring the castes together and also to soften the differences between Hindus and Moslems. But among the masses of the people the caste system survives almost as rigidly as ever; while the communal differences between Hindus and Moslems and in the Punjab between both communities and the Sikhs has increased and become more bitter in recent years.

The intense bitterness between the two leading communities, for there are 80,000,000 Mohammedans, is a factor of the greatest importance in India today. In the villages and country districts the two communities live together with a fair amount of mutual toleration. But in the cities and in political circles, the communal hostilities are appalling.

Now, what is the cause of this hostility? Superficially, there may not appear to be much racial difference between Moslems and Hindus, for the Moslem conquerors from the north were not very numerous, compared to the teeming millions of the peoples of the great peninsula, and they found their wives, for the most part, among the Hindus they conquered. But centuries of different customs, of different religions that enter tremendously into the daily life of the people, a different outlook on life, have produced two almost separate races.

The Mohammedans in India.

The Mohammedans have neglected learning and also political organization. They have a tradition of warfare, and most of the fighting races of India are Moslems. In competitive examinations they are hard put to it to hold their own with the Hindus. Under British rule they can be assured of fair treatment; but they fear Indian Swaraj (independence), which would mean Hindu domination. For, except in a couple of provinces, the Hindus would swamp them.

Probably the ablest Moslem leader is Jinnah, a distinguished lawyer, a man of great intellect and character and a member of the Legislative Assembly. He is a Home Ruler and as patriotic, from the Indian point of view, as any of the other leaders. He and his co-religionists fear, above all things, a Hindu Government, elected on a common voting roll, supported and its laws enforced by British troops.

In the opinion of the highest military authorities of the British Army, if the British withdrew and left the Mahommedans and Hindus to fight it out, as everyone expects they would do, the Mahommedans would win, and the end of the struggle to eject the Brtish would be a Mahommedan Government, with the rule of the sword.

I discussed this at length with Gandhi and he admitted the likelihood of this chain of events.

"But," he said, "we Indians would be better off under a Mahommedan Government than we are today under the British, for it would be a native Indian Government and would not impoverish the people as you English have done."

But this fighting and chaos could take place only if the British withdrew and evacuated India in a hurry. I put this possibility to every one of the politically extreme Indians with whom I talked, several of whom have since been put into jail. Without exception they declared that they did not desire a British evacuation immediately, and all admitted that it would mean years of civil war and suffering. But some of the younger men said they were prepared, in the last resort, to face it, and that India would win through, as they said Russia had won through.

The Moslems are making desperate efforts to catch up in the cultural sense and are doing their best to make up for their defects in education; but, generally speaking, they are poorer than the Hindus and cannot afford the necessary schooling for their children. Their more immediate remedy lies in the Indianization of the army. Here little progress has been made. We have gone much further with the Indianization of the civil service than we have with the forces. There are plenty of Indian soldiers but few Indian officers. A start has been made with the Indianization of eight battalions out of a total of 180 units, of which some sixty are British. A handful of selected young Indians are sent every year to Sandhurst to be trained as infantry officers. We have just begun to train a few Indians for commissions in the Flying Corps. But there are hardly any artillery or engineer officers, and if India is to enjoy dominion status far more rapid progress must be made with Indianization.

An Indianized Army.

How long will it take to create an Indianized army? I went into this matter very closely. The professional English military officers are either frankly skeptical of an efficient Indian army ever being created or else put the time necessary as twenty-five years or more. The Indian officers, both in the British Army and in the Indian native States, which have their own forces, many of them of a high degree of efficiency, put it at ten to fifteen years, and this estimate agrees with sober Indian political opinion. Taking it at the lowest estimate of ten years, that would seem to me the safety time limit before the responsibility for keeping internal peace, by means of an Indian Army, can be handed over to an all-Indian Government. On the other hand, I found the British military officers quite willing to back up Indian administrators with their own troops in preserving law and order. But that would be neither Swaraj nor dominion status.

Gandhi and the other leading politicians admitted that political agitation had hardly penetrated into the States, especially in the north, and they rely on the attainment of political democracy in British India and the example being eventually followed in the territories of the independent rulers. I consider Gandhi's evidence particularly valuable here, for his father was a State official, being Dewan, or Prime Minister, of the Rajput-Hindu State of Porbandar.

I had long conversations with ten important Indian princes and their principal Ministers—Hindu, Sikh, Mahrattas and Moslem. They have their own grievances against the British Government; for in the past it has been the policy of the political department of the government at Delhi to keep them backward and divided. And this policy continues by its own momentum. Also they feel the racial urge of all educated Indians for equality of status within the empire. They are not unsympathetic to the aspirations of the politicians in British India and they are ready to come into a federal system. But they are not prepared to place themselves and their subjects under an elected Indian Parliament.

In the last resort they will fight; and the general opinion in India is that the majority of their subjects will support them. The population of the Indian self-governing States is 72,000,000. Many of the rulers are very rich and the most powerful, the Nizam of Hyderabad, is the wealthiest man in the world. His territory is as big as France, with 12,000,000 inhabitants.

Politicians and Princes.

Indian politicians are under no illusions about the princes. Patel, the ex-President of the Assembly; his brother, Gandhi's principal lieutenant and one of the first men to be put into prison when the present troubles began; Pundit Malaviya, a very prominent Hindu leader, distinguished lawyer and scholar and a Brahmin, and others told me personally and frankly that in their opinion the existence of the Indian self-governing States was a serious obstacle to complete independence. Gandhi said this obstacle was insurmountable for the time being.

What is it, then, that the Indian political leaders and especially those engaged in the present violent agitation and who have declared for non-cooperation and civil disobedience desire and expect to get? What is it they want, and what do they think will happen?

Before I answer these questions, let me make it clear who "they" are. Only a small fraction of the peoples of India are politically awakened. There is unrest, in that the cultivators in the districts where they have been stirred up, and particularly in Gujerat, want to pay less rent or less land taxes and the workmen want higher wages and better working conditions. The politically awakened are the intellectuals, the few educated men and the still fewer educated women. Ninety per cent of the population is illiterate. The merchant class and manufacturers hope for better business as a result of fiscal independence.

The short answer, therefore, is that these various elements, and for different reasons, want to be rid of British rule. They want the English to help them as advisers, technicians and experts, and, above all, to guard the dangerous northwest frontier and help them to keep order in India until such time as they can do it themselves. But they want the English in India as servants and not as rulers. These were Gandhi's own words to me. This, to serve rather than to rule, is also the attitude of most of the younger generation of British civil servants from the English universities, "hand-picked" young men of a fine type, and is one of the most hopeful factors in an otherwise gloomy situation.

The demand for independence, except on the part of a few hotheads, is a lever for obtaining dominion status within a measurable period. But many Indians, of various races and creeds, despair of being able to solve their own difficulties among themselves, and this undoubtedly accounts for the refusal of some to participate in the forthcoming round table conference.

I believe the British democracy will feel relieved of a great burden and responsibility when we can hand over the administration of the peninsula to a competent government resting on the will of the Indian people.

LABOR VERSUS MACHINES; AN UNEMPLOYMENT PUZZLE

Technical Progress Made in Last Decade Stress Anew Discarding of Men Displaced in Industry

ings accounts, often put by through years of sacrifice in order to give the children a chance, are drawn out and the children never have the start in life that would enable them to make something of their abilities. The study also shows that of the men who were able to find new work, nearly half—48 per cent—had to take a lower salary, meaning a further reduction in the standard of living, a further sacrifice for father and mother, and more lost opportunities for the children.

The problem of adjustment, of learning new skills in new jobs, is also well brought out by this study. Less than one-tenth of those wage earners who were laid off were able to get back again to their old jobs. Only one-third of those who found work were able even to obtain employment in the same industry. For most of them—54 per cent—the lay-off meant a complete change of work, so that old skills, learned often through years of training and experience and bringing high pay, were useless and the workers had to begin all over again at the bottom and learn a new trade at lower pay. Trained cutters with years of experience in the clothing industries found work as attendants at gasoline stations, watchmen in warehouses, clerks in meat markets. A machinist was selling hosiery for a mail order house; a skilled lathe operator was running a mixer in a cement brick plant; a licensed stationary engineer took work as caretaker in a public park; a skilled welding machine operator became a farm hand. And so the story goes.

For the older workers the problem of finding new work was far more difficult than for the younger. Fewer of the men over 45 were able to find work, and more of them were out for long periods. The price of our industrial progress is too often paid by the man over 45, who has reached just the age when his children are in their teens and his income counts most for their future.

Two very diverse policies accompany mechanization of industry. The time of the employed worker has become of much greater value and every effort is made to increase his productivity. The displaced worker is as ruthlessly scrapped as an out-of-date machine—even with less concern—for every well-managed institution has an amortization fund to provide against obsolete machines.

Scrapping the Worker.

Men who have given years of their lives to producing the products upon which the reputation of the industry rests are discharged without any consideration for what they have invested in the industry. Neither industries nor society have worked out a plan for meeting either separate or joint indebtedness to workers who lose that society may gain.

A dismissal wage, to help absorb the "shock," is paid by some few industries, but this is not adequate to meet the problem of readjustment. Organized labor is spokesman for these victims of the progress of industrial technology. We urge as a program for meeting the needs of these workless individuals:

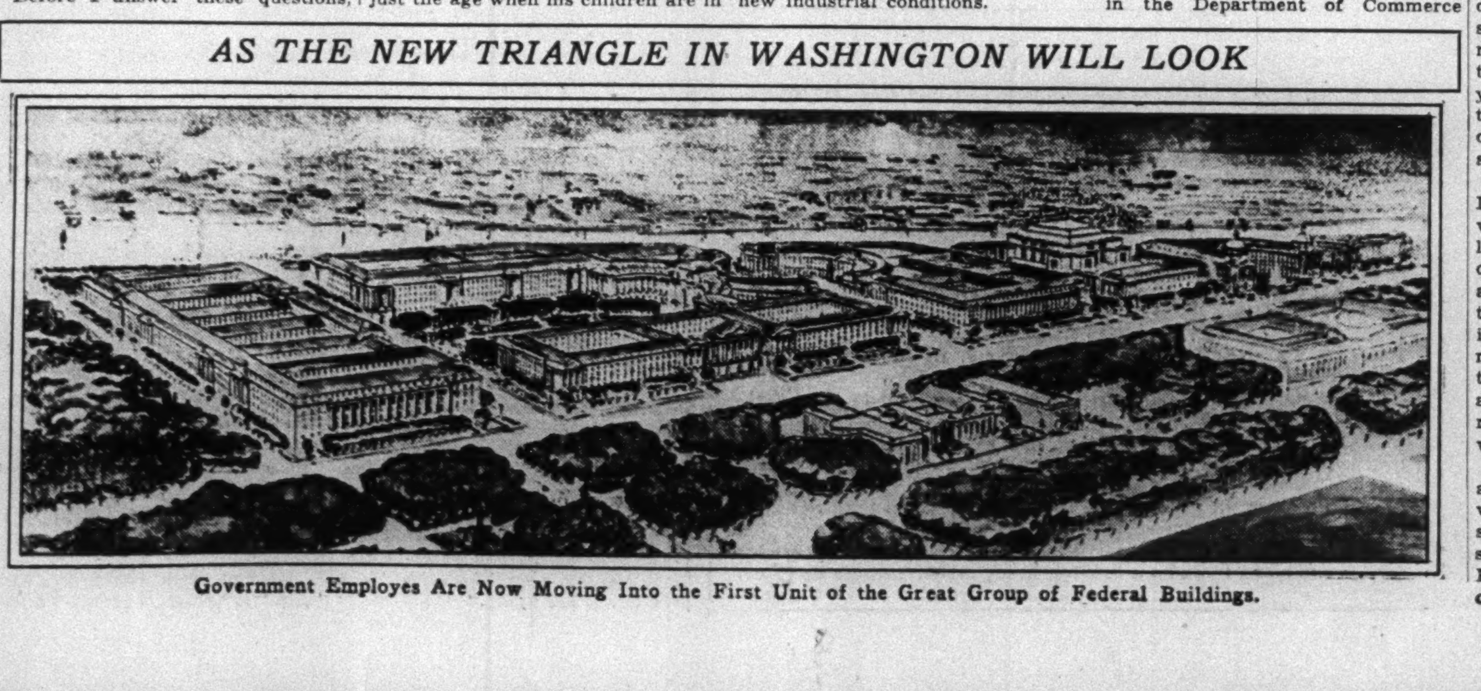
Shorter daily and weekly work periods, in order that more workers shall be employed and all shall have leisure to enjoy the products of industry.

Higher incomes for wage earners, in order that this vast potential market may be able through its purchases to stimulate industries to their full capacity.

A system of Federal employment agencies for the workless, so that they may have most efficient services in finding all possible work opportunities.

A vocational guidance service connected with employment offices to help workers whose crafts are displaced by new production methods equip themselves for positions under new industrial conditions.

AS THE NEW TRIANGLE IN WASHINGTON WILL LOOK



Government Employes Are Now Moving Into the First Unit of the Great Group of Federal Buildings.

NEW WASHINGTON BUILDINGS EMERGE

The Finished and Nearly Finished Structures Suggest the Effect New Group Will Present

By WILLIAM ATHERTON DU PUY.

WASHINGTON.

THEY are moving into the first of the seventy-four-acre group of buildings the government is erecting in Washington as a challenge of magnificence to all lands and all times. This is the $10,000,000 Internal Revenue Building, destined to become the counting house into which the annual billions to run the government will pour.

Two blocks away the biggest office building in the world—that of the Department of Commerce, custodian of the government's relations with the world of trade—has put on its outer shell. Secretary Hyde of the Department of Agriculture has opened his desk in the new marble palace on the brow of a hill beyond the Mall, from which he directs the activities of 23,000 people.

The government is ready to begin on similar structures for the Departments of Labor and of Justice, for the Postoffice Department, for government archives, for the Supreme Court and for others. The building plan is to contribute toward making Washington the most magnificent capital in the world.

The Commerce Building is still in the chrysalis. The Internal Revenue Building, now completed, is a four-acre block of steel and stone, and ranks second in size in the big program. This structure, near the heart of the triangle between the treasury and the Capitol, which under the new régime is to be the seat of most of the government's activities, may be pointed to as furnishing exhibit A of finished work. From it may be judged the splendor the group will ultimately present.

Where 3,800 Will Work.

It is so designed as to be externally a monumental building and internally a practical office building. Seven stories high, it covers a ground area 410 by 452 feet. It is intended at present to house 3,800 government employes and may take care of 5,000.

Since it is here in the midst of the great development, one wonders how it will rank in architectural beauty. A number of artistically great structures have developed in Washington out of circumstances that might well have created hodgepodges. The Capitol grew by accretions through the decades and emerged a masterpiece. Washington Monument began with an unattractive design, remained long incompleted, and emerged in a solemn impressiveness.

The Internal Revenue Building is of Greek classical design, adapted to modern needs. Its most impressive front is on B Street, which is destined to become the dominant boulevard of the city. Arlington Memorial Bridge, a $15,000,000 undertaking, which also is nearing completion, will open into it from Virginia at the Lincoln Memorial. The boulevard will pass between the Mall and the concourse of the triangle buildings, will skirt the Union Station side of the Capitol grounds and pass on out into Maryland. It will be magnificently gardened all the way through the city and its name will be changed—perhaps to L'Enfant Boulevard.

The base of the building is Maine granite, its walls are Indiana limestone, and its splendid row of free-standing Doric columns are of Tennessee marble. The stone work is rusticated. There are balustrades at the base of the columns and above them. The effect is simple and classical.

Treatment for Acoustics.

The interior is, of course, designed for utility. Special treatment serves the peculiar purposes to which the building is to be put. There is a long corridor, for example, that is to be given over to tabulating machines, and another to telegraph instruments. The two corridors are lined with a tile composed largely of gypsum and asbestos, which reduces noise.

In digging the foundations for this building, an ancient dock was discovered. A hundred years ago Tiber Creek ran through here and boats came all the way to Pennsylvania Avenue. Dolly Madison wrote of the marsh that overran the area that is the evolving triangle.

Along about 1530, San Michell, a master architect, was building palaces, churches and fortifications in Verona. These structures are still standing, and people travel far to view them. Now, 400 years later, York & Sawyer of New York, who built the Federal Reserve Bank and the Guaranty Trust Building, in Manhattan, have set their architects, headed by L. A. Ayers, to adapt San Micheli's style to the architecture of the American national capital. Thus in the Department of Commerce Building, at the broad end of Washington's Federal triangle, the renaissance is to be magnificently reflected in the most stupendous of buildings.

The structure is now approaching completion. Secretary Lamont will be moving into its central section by the end of the year. Twelve months from now the Census Bureau, in the midst of wrestling with the facts it has recently assembled, will find a permanent home in the southern section, bordering on this same B Street that leads up from Lincoln Memorial and is to become a boulevard.

The Census Bureau will share this section with the Coast and Geodetic Survey, which tells mariners where the water is deep and where it is shallow. A little later the Patent Office will occupy a three-acre block of the building whose marble Ionic columns will face Pennsylvania Avenue, across a tiny park just at the point where inaugural parades turn in front of the treasury.

Activities Brought Together.

Gathered in the great central section of the building will be such activities of this department as the Aeronautic Branch of the government, its agencies that study radio, the Steamboat Inspection Service, the Bureaus of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Mines, Lighthouses and Navigation. Every agency of the department but one will be thus gathered in from miscellaneous and scattered buildings, mostly rented, and brought together under a single roof. The exception is the Bureau of Standards, whose huge laboratories call for a group of buildings that sprawl all over a suburban hilltop five miles away.

The Department of Commerce Building is 1,050 feet long—that is to say, three full blocks—and 350 feet wide. Thus it covers eight acres of ground, which is a large area to be blanketed with limestone and marble. The Capitol, which in itself is a huge structure, could rattle around comfortably within its walls. New York skyscrapers, to be compared with it, would need to be laid on their sides, and so disposed, three of the largest would just about occupy the space it does. It is the first building in history that ever called for the driving of 18,000 piles on which it might rest. Twenty thousand tons of structural steel have been used. There is half a square mile of glass in the windows, and a mile and a half of interior walls to be decorated.

Five thousand government workers will come down here for their seven hours every day. As the department grows, 7,000 may be accommodated. If this industry housed in one building were planted out on the prairies of Kansas or the marshes of New Jersey, the families of the workers and those who cater to them would bring about the development of a town of 30,000 or 40,000 people.

An Aquarium in the Building.

The fact that the Bureau of Fisheries is in the Department of Commerce suggested the development of a unique feature for the central section of the building. An aquarium, appropriately designed, is being built into it and the government intends to develop it into one of the largest in the world.

The new building is expected to mark an era in the housing of Federal departments. But its builders expect more of it than that. They believe that it will rank as an architectural masterpiece. Fred M. Kramer, Washington representative of the builder, points from the window of his construction shack to an exterior wall at a point where the rows of classic pillars are not at all in evidence. That wall, he says, is a poem in stone.

The position the building occupies is one of much importance in the plan of the city. The structure fills up the whole end of the triangle where it rests on the venerable and shaded parkway that lies back of the White House and extends from Pennsylvania Avenue to B Street. Its back is turned to the park, but this back is little less beautiful than the front, which looks toward the Capitol and into the heart of the triangle. Both ends are adorned with Ionic marble pillars, which give the building an impressive appearance from every angle. The completion of this block will mean a realization of a substantial item in the building program to which the government has set its hand.

The administration building for the Department of Agriculture is even now completed and Secretary Hyde has moved into it and adjusted his eyes to peering out between the marble pillars that will hereafter frame his view of the world. That view is as yet marred by the scars of recently torn earth and by the intrusion of the rear end of the ancient red brick building which has housed the department from the time, fifty years ago, when it had but seventy-two employes and was but starting on that growth which has developed a staff of 23,000.

In the end the view from the Department of Agriculture Building will be one of the fairest in all the land. Next to the Capitol, it may claim to have the choice location in all Washington. The Mall, which extends from the Capitol, past Washington Monument to the Lincoln Memorial and looks across to Arlington, is now ready to take final form and claim the honor of being the most magnificent area in all the world.

Roughly, this Mall is a strip of land a mile long and a quarter of a mile wide. It slopes down toward Pennsylvania Avenue and mounts into something of a hill toward the back. Few buildings have been permitted on it, but its choicest vantage point was early pre-empted by the Department of Agriculture. The new building sits on its back boundary where the ground is highest and faces the parkway, just across which is the great triangle where a score of other handsome buildings are to rise. Between them the Mall is to be bisected by a grand roadway leading down from the Capitol.

This administration building of the Department of Agriculture, properly speaking, is not a part of that building program which has been adopted within the last few years. The plan for it was laid down twenty-five years ago by James Wilson, who was Secretary for sixteen years. He asked Congress for money to put up a building with a handsome and monumental central section, and wings reaching out until they made it 750 feet long. Congress in those days was more parsimonious. Instead of giving Secretary Wilson the money he asked for, it gave him less. He was unwilling to compromise, and so spent the appropriation in erecting the two wings, with a vacancy between. For twenty years they stood aloof from each other. Now they have been welded together.

Incidentally, there is little about the building that suggests agriculture. It is a classic, white-marble, Corinthian-columned structure that might well be mistaken for an art gallery or a library of magnificent proportions. Experts say that it is one of the most correctly planned and properly proportioned of government buildings. Inside is a court where fountains play. It is trimmed in varicolored marble and festooned with strange and exotic plants, such as the department brings in from all corners of the world.

These three buildings completed, operations pause for a bit, but upon receipt of additional funds to be provided by the present Congress, the work is expected to hurry along next year to accomplishments of similar proportions.

THE JEST THAT STIRRED PARIS

PARIS.

PAUL MORAND, one of the best known of France's youngest novelists, when he jestingly told Americans of the American Club at Paris they ought to return home to find culture instead of hunting it abroad, brought more varieties of trouble on his head than he had bargained for. Intellectuals were upset, declaring Americans would take him seriously; artists were aggrieved, and now even the hotel and tourist industries are protesting.

"Well, Bernard Shaw does it," was his excuse when taken to task by Le Temps. "I didn't say anything that wasn't in the vein of some of his remarks in 'The Apple Cart.' I've been told that French exporters have protested against my remarks, but I really wish to have it known that I have nothing against the French tourist industry or our excellent hotel keepers. Let them be reassured."

The Temps, however, is not inclined to accept entirely this light apology.

"We hope Mr. Morand's reply will receive the large publicity in the United States that was given to his speech at the American Club, but we are inclined to doubt it," says the editor. "Mr. Morand says he didn't mean to cause grief to our hotel keepers, but if we read his words correctly it was neither our cuisine nor our lingerie he referred to. It was our culture and our civilization that he poked fun at with his Shavian wit, and his audience took him literally. That's generally the way with Shavian wit, and we think it can better be left to Mr. Shaw. M. Morand thinks his remarks were of no importance, anyway, but he is much too modest. He's an enfant terrible."

MODERN IDEAS ENTER OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

AN EXPERIMENT IN EDUCATION

Progressive Ideas Are Being Tried Out in Greenwich Avenue

By ESTHER GRAY.

PROGRESSIVE education is often regarded as the distinct privilege of the private school. Yet, within a New York public school today, sponsored by the Public Education Association and the Board of Education, is being successfully carried on an experiment as radically different from traditional practice as any that the most advanced private school can offer.

Down on Greenwich Avenue, in the three lower grades of Public School 41, now dubbed "The Little Red Schoolhouse," is being worked out a kind of demonstration program of the possibilities of progressive education in the regular public school system. In the words of the director, Miss Elizabeth Irwin, it has become a laboratory "not where educators experiment with children, but where children experiment with life." But it is a laboratory which has not forgotten the old claims of academic achievement. From it, as has already been demonstrated, children are expected to pass with high standing in the three R's into the upper grades.

What makes this program so fundamentally different from the traditional one? First of all, the curriculum is founded on first-hand experience. Academic work is postponed till the second grade. The program is flexible, allowing for the spontaneous interest of the child and the original contributions of the teacher. Summer camp during June serves as a continuation of the Winter program. Striking to the observer, also, are the longer periods daily for outdoor play and for indoor rhythmic dancing and relaxation, and the varied and abundant opportunity for floor play, for craft and art expression, and for trips.

Moreover, there is an atmosphere of informality and ease, of an intimate understanding of the child's needs which makes the visitor exclaim, "Where is the screwed-down desk, where are the stiff-backed children, where are the agonizing drills?"

Activity to the right, activity to the left—with opportunities for choice all about. Despite having thirty children in the class, the teacher is able to direct the many crafts which grow spontaneously with the children's needs and ability. Betty and Mary and Johnny, each wants chickens and hens for their farm play. There are not enough to satisfy them. "Make them during the craft period," suggests the teacher. Weaving, clay modeling, linoleum printing, carpentry, costume designing, encourage productivity. Even talkative Harry succumbs at last to this atmosphere of work and becomes self-critical and determined: "I'm going to make a motor engine and stick to it until it's finished."

Practical Arithmetic.

Not until the second year is any formalized work in arithmetic offered. Much incidental number work, however, is developed whenever the occasion arises. "How many children are absent? How many rolls shall we buy for lunch? How wide is your boat? Here are four packages of gelatine. How many pints of water shall we use?" Long before he need struggle with symbols and without the accompanying drills the child comprehends quantity in dealing with real experiences.

The reading, too, is postponed until the second year, before which picture books of farm animals, the policeman, the postman, the fireman, are presented during the library period. The enjoyment of these books, first as pictures of familiar situations, conditions the child toward a desire to read them later on.

The question is often asked: Does this experiment measure up in academic achievement? The answer lies in the astonishing conclusion to be drawn from the results of the tests given to the children in a previous six-year experiment under Miss Irwin at Public School 61. There, too, with a similar program, the children did not begin their academic work in reading and numbers until the second year, and gave far less time to it thereafter than the pupils of the ordinary public school. At the end of the sixth year these children were tested, proving themselves in most cases superior in the three R's to the control group of pupils of equal intelligence who had studied in the regulation way.

Trips of Orientation.

Another contribution which this experiment emphasizes as feasible in the public school situation is the weekly trip. Around this, indeed, centre floor and outdoor play, language expression, craft work and geography experience. It becomes a general source of information and recall.

Mrs. Lucy Sprague Mitchell of the "Here and Now Story Book" fame, who is directing this activity, declares: "These trips have two aspects. The first is orientation, the basis of map making and locational geography; the second is first-hand acquaintance with the environment, particularly with the work aspect of the environment which underlies human geography."

Through his trips to the markets, the bakery, the freight yards, boats at the piers, the various city departments at work, through his orientation to his surroundings, the child establishes an intelligent relationship with the world about him.

Another feature in the educational program which stimulates the teacher and enriches the child's background is the flexibility of programming the daily activities. Although adhering to a definite schedule, the teacher may use her judgment in meeting a particular situation by rearranging or postponing it. A beautiful clear day may be just the time to view the rivers and bridges and barges from a roof instead of the indoor work as planned. Or perhaps during the music period, the Swedish boy begs to sing a native folksong, another offers to learn a German song, another recalls a Russian lullaby.

What if the teacher's original purpose was to develop "tonal recognition"? Shall she ignore the implications of so spontaneous a burst of interest? She seizes this opportunity to make the children aware of each other's contributions.

Then there is the unique educational contribution of the camp experience during June. Perhaps 100 children will spend two or four weeks at the Hudson Guild Farm at Netcong, N. J.

In response to the need for a greater objectivity in judging school situations, an effort is being made to keep records of the child's emotional and social reactions as well as records of methods and curriculum. Was the activity on the child's level? Did it arouse effective response? Was the child spontaneous and adjusted? The teacher uses these records as a check-up on her own approach and as reference for a more adequate knowledge of the child's problems. The visiting teacher and the future teacher may use them for a more complete picture of the child's behavior.

The little red schoolhouse is keenly aware that no educational program is complete without linking the home factor with the school situation. It therefore offers the parent the opportunity of feeling part of the organization. The children's lunch room is supervised by the mothers, who feel at home in the school.

Another feature which makes this experiment valuable to the public school is its relationship toward its community. Not only parents but also the physicians, nurses and other neighborhood agencies and experts are being drafted for the necessary cooperation in fitting an environment to the child, where all the elements tend to develop a healthy, intellectually alert, socially minded personality.

MIND GUIDANCE FOR FRESHMEN

Carnegie Foundation Proposes That Each Have a Tutor

RESTORING to the modern college freshman the spiritual equivalent of Mark Hopkins and the log is the prescription for the ills of our higher educational system just proposed by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching. At the close of the second year of its study of the relations of secondary and higher education in Pennsylvania, it states its conclusion: that the mass teaching in our colleges must at least be supplemented by a more personal contact.

"No student," says the report, "should be admitted to the campus who cannot be placed immediately in charge of a competent representative of the college who will make him a subject of deliberate study and will personally direct his education."

From the first, each boy, according to the report, should have as tutor or preceptor one of the most sympathetic, experienced and scholarly professors the college has—a man with "the comprehensive educational interest of a college dean or president, unimpaired by his administrative distractions and isolation, and fired with a scholar's inveterate love of knowledge."

Little by little, the tutor should divest the student's mind of his high school preconceptions of education. He should show him that "the reporting from books and encyclopedias, the passing of tests, and so forth, are superficial, and in some cases even worthless, performances; that his real business in college is to gather valuable ideas, to criticize them and to arrange them with other ideas in satisfactory and defensible relations."

Having persuaded the student that the "beginning of education is a disposition to think vigorously for one's self," the tutor should discuss with him the direction which his own thinking may best take during his college course.

TEACHING ART APPRECIATION

Lessons in Good Taste Take the Place of Drawing Work

NEW YORK CITY'S high school system, with its 170,000 pupils, has executed a complete about-face in the matter of teaching art, and there is evidence that other educational systems in various parts of the country will do likewise within a short time. At its meeting this week the Board of Education adopted the recommendations of the Art Department for a totally new approach to secondary school art education.

Instead of the old method of attempting to teach untalented pupils to draw, the new compulsory two-year course will strive to inculcate good taste and the rudiments of art appreciation. It abolishes, in short, for all save students who elect to do creative work, the "art school method" of developing artistic judgment.

The new course as it will be taught in the New York public schools next Fall covers everything from table manners to city planning, revealing what is good taste and what is not in all things. The students will be shown that there is art even in the mass production of automobiles, in 5-and-10-cent-store articles, in linoleum prints, in newspaper and magazine advertising, in bill boards, trade-marks and in skyscrapers as well as cathedrals.

Specifically, the children will study art appreciation in the community, the home, the school, the office, the theatre, in dress, design, color, printing and advertising, the graphic arts, architecture, painting, sculpture and art in industry. These are the subject headings. The pupils will be taught always with a view toward developing their powers of discrimination and establishing a familiarity with the finest in artistic expression.

The class studying art in the community will be asked, for instance, to make a tracing from photographs or prints of important buildings, then to suggest a rearrangement of the buildings to form a more artistic group. As guides, the children will have sketch plans of the Roman Forum or Pompeii. They will note the important buildings and triumphal arches and how they are placed.

Art in the Home.

Children's studying art in the home will collect illustrations of designs for homes and gardens. They will mount illustrations of rooms showing the arrangement of rugs and make critical analyses of the color, pattern and placing of these rugs. They will collect illustrations of pieces of furniture well related to the size of the room they are in. Suggested rearrangements of furniture in rooms will be made by the students.

To illustrate art in industry the children will be asked among other things to select from newspaper advertisements good examples of mechanical toys: Japanese, German and American toys, for example. They will have an opportunity to design toys for school sale using the animal, bird and humorous figure motifs.

The collection of pictures and photographs and the pageants and plays in the school assembly will play a large part in the art appreciation course. Class recitations will take the form of discussions.

To Create Taste.

The success of the new course, according to Forrest Grant, director of art in the New York City secondary schools, seems already assured. Experiments with the new syllabus in a half dozen scattered schools have shown that the number of voluntary visitors to museums has doubled and the number of students electing to study art on their own initiative has increased by 2,000 in a single year.

"The change," said Mr. Grant, "is one of approach. No public school system has ever attempted to make artists out of all its students, but, as far as I know, all systems have followed the 'art school method' of attempting to bring children to art appreciation by first teaching them to draw. This method is an indirect one, and in the case of untalented children is slow, and frequently won't work at all.

"We have a world full of artists but a relatively small demand for their work because so few have been trained to appreciate it. Every one is born with an ability to appreciate art, but creative artists starve in garrets because this ability has been allowed to lie dormant and undeveloped in the great mass of the people.

"Our new course is designed to create an instant emotional reaction to art qualities in all students, the talented and the untalented. We can create a demand for more and finer art by thousands of people and thus provide the consumers of art so necessary for art itself, as well as for the creators of art objects.

"We are going to teach our young people how to live as distinguished from how to make a living. We think we can engender a love for beauty, develop good taste and train for leisure. We can do these things, in addition to encouraging talent and gratifying the desire to create.

The Old Idea.

"What happens under the present system? Only about 10 per cent of our students are really proficient in art. Less than 3 per cent take up art as their life's work. Many of the remaining 90 per cent develop an actual distaste for art as a result of their being required to do something for which they have no talent. The old course has given them the impression that talent and technical ability are necessary for any real acquaintance with art. The new course is designed to correct that impression."

Mr. Grant credits Arthur Dow, formerly curator of Japanese art at the Boston Museum, with having conceived the idea that art appreciation rather than drawing should be taught in the public schools. He says that all he himself has done is to take advantage of an opportunity presented to him to embody Mr. Dow's ideas in an actual public school course.

IN THE CLASSROOM

LITTLE by little the academic year, once confined to a paltry nine months, is creeping all the way around the calendar. First, the Summer school partially filled up the gap. Now, at the Pennsylvania State College appears an intersession, designed to occupy the two weeks between the close of the regular college year and the Summer school opening.

Although the courses in this new academic unit fit into those offered in the Summer session, they may be taken separately, offering a concentrated course to the teachers who desire to take a period of training and still have a long vacation. Here, too, will be provided opportunity to finish work for a degree which lacks but two credits for its completion, or to obtain an additional two credits for Summer work.

Similarly, if less deliberately, at other universities, various special institutes will serve to make the college year a literal reality. At Lafayette, for instance, there is a one-week alumni college. At Williams College and the Universities of Iowa and of Georgia are institutes of political affairs, while at various Western universities, conferences on parent education fill up the calendar.

FAME AND THE TEACHER.

THE unveiling last month of the new portrait bust of Horace Mann in the Hall of Fame has led to some confusion as to his priority among the five educators now included. As a matter of fact, he was not only the first teacher to be accorded the honor, but he won it exactly thirty years ago at the founding of the hall, among the first group of distinguished men of all sorts to be memorialized. It is only now, however, that his portrait bust, made especially for the hall by the sculptor A. A. Weinman, has replaced an older one temporarily loaned for the purpose.

Among the four teachers who have since followed Mann in the hall three are women, pioneers in the education of their sex. Mary Lyon, the founder of Mount Holyoke College and Emma Willard, establisher of the school which bears her name, were admitted at the next election in 1905; and Alice Freeman Palmer, a president of Wellesley, in 1920. The other man, Mark Hopkins, for thirty-six years president of Williams, was elected in 1915. Today there is a movement to honor similarly Henry Barnard, first Federal Commissioner of Education.

A GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY.

APPARENTLY the much boasted California climate is as conducive to scholastic as to vegetable growth. True, at any rate, to State traditions, the student body of the University of Southern California, whose fiftieth anniversary is to be celebrated this week, has increased as amazingly as the fortune of a forty-niner in the gold rush. Its fifty-five students in 1880 have become more than 18,000 today.

At the coming festival, which will mark the university's development from one to twenty different colleges and schools, not only distinguished Americans from various parts of the country but a personal representative of King Alfonso of Spain will be present. Viconde de Casa Aguilar, a Spanish scholar, has traveled across an ocean and a continent to convey the greetings of his government to the university grown great in a land once subject to the Spanish Crown.

On the university campus, however, the chief memorial which will be unveiled will symbolize a civilization still further removed in both time and space. A colossal bronze statue of the Spirit of Troy, which the university has long had as its emblem, will be dedicated above a rostrum that is to serve as a campus centre for reunions, academic gatherings and athletic rallies. LETTERS TO THE EDITOR FROM TIMES READERS ON TOPICS IN THE NEWS

STATE NOT LIABLE FOR RESULT OF ITS AGENTS' CARELESSNESS

Rule of Respondeat Superior Not Applicable in Exercise of Sovereignty

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The recent catastrophe at the Ohio State Penitentiary renews interest in the responsibilities of the State for the lives of prisoners confined in State institutions.

Ordinarily the rule of "respondeat superior" applies—that is, in lay terms, that the master is responsible for the acts of his agent or servant.

Put the proposition in this way: If you operate a building, and allow people to come into it, and through the negligence of your employes the doors are kept locked while a fire is raging, so that many people are killed, you, of course, would have to respond in damages for any lives that were lost, or for any injuries inflicted upon those who are in the building.

But, strange as it may seem to the layman, this rule of "respondeat superior" does not apply in cases where the State or other branch of the government is exercising what is known as a function of sovereignty. It is the general law in our American courts that in caring for its prisoners the State is exercising a governmental or sovereign function, and is therefore not liable to the prisoner or his estate for any injuries inflicted upon him, even though such injuries be caused by the negligence or carelessness of its own employes.

An Ohio Precedent.

It is interesting to note that the Ohio courts have already had occasion to adjudicate upon the case of a prisoner who was burned to death in a jail. In Alvord v. Richmond, 3 Ohio (N. P.) 136, decided in 1896, it was held that a village was not liable for the carelessness and negligence of its officers and agents in building a fire in a worn-out and cracked stove in a village lock-up, whereby it took fire and burned to death a prisoner confined therein, without any means of escape. This ruling would of course be controlling upon the Ohio courts should any suits be instituted against the State because of the recent holocaust at Columbus.

Even New York State, which has gone very far in alleviating the harsh rule of the common law that the sovereign is not responsible for the acts of its agents no matter how negligently performed, would nevertheless bar recovery if a similar event occurred in one of the jails of this State.

As was said in the leading case of Smith v. State of New York, 227 N. Y. 405, "the rule is well settled that the State is not liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of its officers and agents unless such liability has been assumed by constitutional or legislative enactment."

Special Act Needed.

In other words, if relief were to be obtained in this State, it would require the passage of a special act of the Legislature of this State, which statute would expressly have to waive the State's sovereign immunity and permit suit to be instituted against it for the negligent acts of its employes. It can well be imagined the interminable delay which would necessarily result before such an act could be passed through the Legislature. Furthermore, even if such act were passed, the ordinary courts could not hear such a case. It would have to be brought in a special court called the Court of Claims.

As an example of a special statute, permitting a prisoner to sue the State of New York, reference is made to the case of Kahn v. State of New York, reported in 190 Supp. 894.

Of course, to permit a recovery, all the conditions laid down in the enabling act would have to be complied with, and yet in the Kahn case, despite the seeming consent of the Legislature, the claim was dismissed by the Claims Court because it held that the language of the enabling act was not broad enough to impose liability upon the State.

State Servants Not Excused.

This immunity of the State, however, would not excuse the agents or servants of the State if they actually were guilty of negligence. But such a remedy would be a travesty, for how could a financially irresponsible jailer adequately respond in damages for the terrible loss he caused? It is doubtful even if the warden of the jail could be held in the Ohio fire, because, unless it could be shown that he directly or indirectly authorized the act of his deputy or jailer in refusing to release the convicts from their cells, he is not liable. Here again a special rule of law applies.

As was said in the case of Lansford v. Johnston, 5 Tenn. C. C. A. 565, affirmed 132 Tenn. 615: "Public officers [in that particular case it referred to the warden of a jail] are not liable for the negligence of their subordinate officers, whether appointed by them or not; and the ordinary rule of respondeat superior does not apply. They are liable for their own negligence, and liability for that of their inferiors only arises where the latter are their personal agents or private servants. The exemption of a public officer from liability for the negligence of a subordinate official is said to rest on reasons of public policy."

In New York State, however, it might be possible to hold the warden personally liable for the jailer's failure to safeguard the lives of the prisoners in his keeping, for Section 156 of the New York prison law provides, that "whenever by reason of any State prison, or any building contiguous to such prison, being on fire, there shall be reason to apprehend that the prisoners may be injured or endangered by such fire, or may escape, it shall be the duty of the agent or warden of such prison to remove such prisoners to some safe and convenient place, and there confine them until the necessity of such removal shall have ceased."

From this statute it will be noted that the burden to provide for the safety of the prisoners is placed squarely upon the warden himself. In other words, the failure of the warden to carry out the express mandate of the statute would in itself be evidence of negligence. However, no case construing this statute has been reported in New York, although it has been in effect since 1889.

Rulings in Other States.

There are precedents, however, in other States holding a Sheriff liable for the negligence of his deputies where the duty of safekeeping of the prisoners was by statute expressly placed upon the Sheriff or warden. But, even assuming that the warden could be held liable, along with his deputies, the question properly asked is, "Why should the families of the deceased convicts have to depend upon the doubtful financial responsibility of private individuals?"

The burden for reparation in the Columbus case should be placed squarely upon the State of Ohio. If necessary, special legislation should be enacted by the Ohio Legislature to give some adequate relief to the bereaved families. True enough, the men killed were convicts, but, nevertheless, they were the wards of the State. It is Ohio's duty to make amends to their families if their death was caused by the negligence of the State's employes.

George W. Wickersham, former Attorney General of the United States and now chairman of President Hoover's Law Observance and Law Enforcement Commission, is quoted in The Times of May 9 as having said in his address as president of the American Law Institute "that prison conditions in this country are crying aloud to high heaven for immediate improvement and that immediate relief is necessary in dealing with the situation presented by antiquated, overcrowded, unsanitary and unsafe prisons."

But if we do persist in sending our prisoners to "antiquated, overcrowded, unsanitary and unsafe prisons" and thereby cause them to be injured or killed, then in Heaven's name let us be willing to make prompt and just amends as a matter of right and not as a matter of favor.

Our own State can learn a lesson from this tragedy. The Baumes Crime Commission has been extended by the New York Legislature for another year. The commission can, among other things, recommend to the Legislature a provision for the liberalization of our laws so that in case any convict is injured through the fault of the State or of its deputies he, or in case of his death his family, should have the absolute right to ask the State to respond in damages for the wrong done him.

DISFIGURING NATURE'S FACE

Automobile 'Graveyards" and Billboards Spoil Many a Vacation Trip

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The American people are the world's greatest travelers, and one needs to make only a superficial study of their annual pilgrimages to discover that their desire to see the beauties of unspoiled natural scenery is the lodestone that, perhaps more than any other thing, draws them onward in their journeyings. It is the beauty of mountain and valley meadow and woodland, swamp and desert which attracts them. By a large majority, the thing most desired is to see the country in its wild, natural state.

Of course parks are sometimes beautiful and formal gardens have their attractions, but who would not prefer to wander in a field of daisies on a hillside in the country than look at a bed of marguerites in the city? Or who would not prefer to smell the sweet, delicate odor and see the wild beauty of a field of columbine on a mountainside in the Rockies rather than to see the same flowers planted in straight rows in a garden?

But Nature Is Marred.

In most sections of the United States, due to the generosity and lavish hand of nature, one would not need to go far from his own home to enjoy rare and beautiful scenes were it not for the ravages of despoilers of one kind or another. There can be no justification for a public dump or an automobile "graveyard" at the side of railroads or highways; in fact, in many parts of the country these have been largely eliminated.

The chief offense, however, at the present time is the advertising billboard. In large sections of the country one can scarcely look from a car window or to the side of an automobile road without being told what soup to buy, what paint to use on face or house, the particular brand of hose to wear or the brand of dental cream that will make teeth shine. To make matters worse, many of the billboards are positively hideous. Some are better than others, but they seldom if ever are made to become a harmonious part of the scenery. This, however, is possible. It cannot be done cheaply, but little that is worth while is accomplished without effort. Why advertise at all if one is gaining only the enmity and dislike of the public?

Cooperation Is Needed.

The proper solution of such an advertising scheme would require the combined skill of the professional advertising man, the landscape architect and the artist. The advertising man should select the material to be displayed, the landscape architect would then work out the proper surroundings, planting such trees, shrubs and flowers as would make a frame for the picture and create a perspective, thus adding a natural beauty to the work of the artist. The picture should be made with a full knowledge of the natural setting into which it would be placed and made to harmonize and to form with its background a complete whole.

Some idea may be formed of the results of such a picture by what was accomplished at the National Flower Show in the Grand Central Palace last Spring. There, however, because of cramped space the results were not all that could be accomplished in an outdoor display.

Let one attractive billboard such as is briefly described be placed within twenty-five miles of any city and it will at once become a common topic of conversation.

AN OPPORTUNITY TO HELP

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In 1905, accompanied by a friend, I took a trip of missionary adventure to visit Doctor, now Sir Wilfred Grenfell on the Labrador. My ignorance of the country was, as our British friends would say, abysmal. Vaguely I knew it was en route to the North Pole and lay somewhere beyond Newfoundland. But the country was not what attracted my friend and myself. Rather, it was a rugged, genuine man who had devoted his all to service to a primitive and unprivileged people in the back-wash of civilization.

Since that time my admiration and esteem for this man of widely diversified labors has constantly increased. He is a veritable good samaritan whose conception of missionary service is as wide in scope as human need and the gospel he preaches touches not alone the spiritual side but ministers to the physical, educational, industrial and social.

In the last twenty-five years I have watched the development of Sir Wilfred's work in Labrador and rejoiced to see the ever widening interest and sympathy in this country for his Labrador venture of faith. It is for this reason I feel confident that if present needs are known by your readers there are many who will count it a privilege to uphold the dauntless doctor in the recent call upon him to meet a real emergency.

In a personal letter, written on the eve of his leaving for the north, he says he is seriously hampered in his work by the breakdown of his electric lighting plant. The equipment urgently requires replacement at a cost of $20,000. There is no provision to meet this and general funds cannot be diverted.

He writes of the essential need of electric light in the hospital as well as in the orphanage, school, industrial plant and homes of the residential staff. He says, "The hospital would be safer and the doctors eased and the patient psychologically more liable to get well. His horror is to be operated on, fearing the light may go out in the middle. When I used to operate, with a native holding a kerosene lamp, I had that accident because the poor loon fainted, and fortunately it went out, instead of firing us all out. I had a big wound open at the time in the patient's thigh, and you can fancy my agony."

Such an experience graphically depicts the immediate need. Gifts to assist Dr. Grenfell may be addressed to Sir Wilfred Grenfell, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York. Sums of any amount, large or small, will be most gratefully appreciated by the apostle of healing to the stalwart fisher folk and their families in the far north.

OUR SPEECH.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I note that Dr. Frank H. Vizetelly, philologist, recently declared that the American speech is "superior" to the British, because "it has greater virility, directness and independence of spirit."

But Sir Israel Gollancz, Professor of English Literature in the University of London, recently lamented "the degradation of the King's English" in the United States.

And the Technical Education Conference at Wellington, N. Z., recently requested the government to discourage American talkies, on the ground that they "will obliterate the work done in the school to promote the speaking of good English."

And at a teachers' convention held in Melbourne, Australia, the delegates unanimously deprecated the employment of typical American expression, referring to American slang in particular as being "almost obscene."

So there you are!

NO NECESSITY FOR CONGRESS TO REGULATE ELECTRIC RATES

States Can Fix Charges Even When Current Enters Interstate Commerce

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I have read with interest The Times editorial of May 14 on the Federal Power Commission. One phase of the various bills proposed in the Senate and the House for the reorganization of the commission was not touched—that is, the extent to which the United States, as distinguished from the State governments, can constitutionally regulate and control the production and distribution of electricity and the charges or rates to be made therefor.

The United States is a government of enumerated powers. In 1785, James Wilson of Pennsylvania advanced a doctrine later adopted by President Roosevelt. He argued that in addition to the powers expressly granted to the Federal Government in the Constitution, and in addition, furthermore, to the powers necessary and proper to carry into effect the delegated powers, there must reside in the Federal Government certain inherent powers of sovereignty. He pointed out that there would be fields of action in which the individual States could not successfully and competently act—fields, nevertheless, which had not been confided to the Federal Government in the Constitution.

"Twilight Zone" Theory Rejected.

The argument for such a "twilight zone" of power residing in the Federal Government has been rejected, however, by the United States Supreme Court, notably in Kansas v. Colorado.

Outside perhaps of the treaty-making power, the only power in the United States to control the hydroelectric industry must be found in the commerce clause of the Constitution, which gives the Federal Government the right to regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign nations. So far as navigation is interstate commerce, Congress may regulate navigation. Water power is produced in large part on streams capable of interstate navigation and, therefore, within the jurisdiction of Congress so far as control of navigation is concerned.

But the proposition that the United States may take over, maintain and operate hydroelectric developments and may control the production and distribution of electricity and the location and construction of projects for hydroelectric development has obviously no remotest relation to navigation as interstate commerce. Such a proposition finds no justification in the commerce clause.

Federal Rate Control.

If Federal regulation of production and distribution of electricity cannot be justified because hydroelectric developments are built in navigable waters—and this seems to be beyond dispute under the decisions of the Supreme Court—there remains to consider to what extent the United States may control electric rates and services because some of the electricity is transmitted in interstate commerce.

Up to the decade between 1880 and 1890 the Supreme Court in its decisions was interested for the most part in determining what transactions constituted interstate commerce. Up to that time two main guiding principles had been established. The first was, that where an activity constituting interstate commerce required nationwide regulation—required uniformity of regulation and control—that activity was for the exclusive regulation of Congress, and even in the absence of Congressional action, the States could not interfere with it or exercise control over it.

Where, however, the activity though constituting interstate commerce was a matter of local concern, then in the absence of Congressional action the States might exercise control.

When Is Commerce Interstate?

From that time on to the present day, however, the Supreme Court finds itself more often asking not what constitutes interstate commerce but what, not being in itself interstate commerce, nevertheless is so directly connected therewith, has such a direct and integral relation therewith, that Congress must control it if it is to retain adequate control over interstate commerce itself.

But the State under its police power may do many things which indirectly affect and, in the language of the court, do not directly burden interstate commerce. The Supreme Court seems to hold in its hands a delicate balance for weighing on the one hand the importance to the State of some exercise of its police power, as against the burden which such exercise will impose upon interstate commerce.

From a study, then, of the Supreme Court decisions under the commerce clause there emerge, among others, certain principles which seem to be thoroughly established:

1. That which is or becomes commerce of an interstate nature is for Congress to control, and that which is or becomes of purely local concern is for the States.

2. Where a subject-matter is not in itself interstate commerce it falls within the regulatory power of Congress only when it has so close a relation to interstate commerce that if Congress could not regulate it the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce itself would be diminished or destroyed.

3. All State action which constitutes a "direct burden" on interstate commerce is void.

4. State action in the exercise by the State of its police power will be held valid if not "directly burdening" interstate commerce, and the validity or invalidity of such action will depend to some extent on its importance to the State, as against the extent to which it affects interstate commerce.

5. In particular, I believe it to be established that the Federal power does not extend to fixing the prices of commodities simply because those commodities will move or have moved in interstate commerce, or simply because the fixing of such prices will affect the amount of the commodity moving in interstate commerce.

Rail v. Power Rates.

This brings us to a distinction between railroad rates and so-called electric or power rates. A railroad rate is the price of transportation. An electric or power rate is the selling price of a commodity. If the court should hold that the selling price of electricity could be fixed by the Federal Government because that electricity had moved in interstate commerce, I think it would necessarily have to hold the same of every other commodity manufactured or produced in the United States which moved across a State line, and this the court has not held, and I think never will hold.

To be sure, electricity is produced and sold by a class of corporations known as public utilities. But I think this gives the government no greater control over the selling price of the product of those corporations than in the case of non-public manufacturing concerns. There is no public utility clause in the United States Constitution. The commerce clause does not justify the fixing of the selling price of any commodity, whether electricity or anything else. The States, to be sure, in return for the grant of franchises and of the privilege of monopoly and eminent domain, may under their police power exercise the right to fix the selling price of electricity, but I fail to find any justification in the Constitution or in the decisions of the Supreme Court for the idea that the United States may do the same.

So far as the control by the United States of hydroelectric utilities, then, is based on the fact that their water power comes from navigable waters of the United States, that control is limited by the Constitution to purposes of navigation, and cannot, I believe, extend beyond the necessities of navigation.

Control of Electric Rates.

So far as the control of the transmission and sale of electricity in interstate commerce is concerned, the control of electric rates is the fixing of the selling price of a commodity. The United States has neither more nor less control thereof because the commodity is produced by a public utility corporation, and the Supreme Court has never held, and I think would hesitate to hold, that the selling price of a commodity could be fixed simply because that commodity moved in interstate commerce.

There are some decisions of the Supreme Court, to be sure, which hold that the State in certain classes of cases cannot regulate the selling price of electricity or similar commodities like natural gas. In Public Utilities Commission v. Attleboro Steam and Electric Company it was held that the State of Rhode Island could not regulate the price of electricity delivered by a Rhode Island company to a Massachusetts company at the State line. But it should be noted that the court did not hold, and has never held, that the Public Utilities Commission of Rhode Island could not regulate the price to Rhode Island consumers of electricity produced by the Rhode Island company, nor that the Massachusetts commission could not regulate the price to Massachusetts consumers of the electricity distributed by the Massachusetts company, though imported from Rhode Island. Indeed, in Public Utilities Commission v. Landon, the court held as to natural gas distributed by companies doing a local intrastate business that the distribution of such gas to local consumers was wholly intrastate and within the control of the State, even though the gas had been delivered to the distributing companies by a company which produced it in another State.

No-Man's Land in Regulation.

If under the Attleboro case the State could not regulate the selling price at the State line of electricity produced in Rhode Island and delivered into Massachusetts, and if my conclusion is correct that the United States likewise could not regulate the selling price of such electricity, then there exists, to be sure, a "no-man's land" in which no regulation is constitutionally possible.

But it is not uncommon under the commerce clause to find such a hiatus. For example, in United States v. Rio Grande Dam and Irrigation Company, the court held that the State could not divert from the non-navigable head waters of a river water which might affect the navigable capacity of the river far below. And in Kansas v. Colorado the court held that the United States could not by statutory enactment provide for the diversion for irrigation and reclamation purposes of waters from a river not navigable where the diversion took place, regardless of how desirable it might be that the Federal Government should have such a power. Neither the State nor the Federal Government, then, could divert such waters for irrigation and reclamation. Furthermore, there are many instances of burdens imposed on interstate commerce by tax and otherwise by State action, which have been held void—instances in which the Federal Government could not lawfully impose the same tax or burden. From the fact that a certain action involving a burden on interstate commerce is unlawful for the States, it does not necessarily follow that the same action is lawful for the Federal Government.

But the hiatus is not too serious. Each State may regulate the price to its own citizens of electricity and power. If the electricity is produced in other States, and distributed by the interstate transmission company direct to consumers within a State, that State, under Pennsylvania Gas Company v. Public Service Commission, may regulate the rates. If electricity is produced in one State and sold to a distributing company in another, while neither the State nor, if I am right, the Federal Government may regulate the selling price, nevertheless the State of destination may regulate the price at which the distributing company sells that electricity to consumers within the State. The prices to be paid by the actual consumers are practically and substantially under the control of the commissions of the States in which they reside.

I find it difficult to believe, therefore, that there is any overwhelming and appealing public necessity for the regulation of electric rates, and in the absence of such necessity I hesitate to think that the Supreme Court of the United States will support the fixing of the selling price of electricity by the Federal Congress, in the face of many intimations that the fixing of prices of commodities is unconstitutional.

Observations on Names and Things Leads to Interesting Conclusion

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The historical background of surnames is simple to understand. Through some chance or personal characteristic the individual would assume it himself or, for similar reasons, the appellation would be given to him by others. Even two men in a community by the name of Paul would have caused confusion; but if one was a tailor and the other the son of John, confusion was avoided by calling one Paul the tailor, or Paul Tailor, and the other Paul John's-son, or Paul Johnson.

This sort of naming was revelant and for proper purposes. Nobody knows, however, when or where it was discovered that certain names may be applied to individuals which would glorify, flatter or magnify; and others which would deride, hurt or kill.

Trouble in a Sauce.

Here I wish to relate a personal experience: The chef of our hotel in a Swiss resort was an ardent Fascist. To emphasize his loyalty he invented a sauce which he named after the Duce. "Sauce Mussolini" was a fairly good dressing for both fish and meat.

Later we visited Italy. Here we observed that among the varied consequences of Mussolini's benevolent tyranny there were also many comic notes. In Italy the name Mussolini is used with great caution in public conversations. The English-speaking tourists soon learn that it is safer to substitute "Smith" when speaking of the Duce. To a Fascist, Mussolini is the most sacred name one may utter.

While in San Remo we were served with a dish one day which had the same sort of dressing which our Fascist chef at Montreux made. Without any wrong intent on my part, and out of sheer joy of meeting an old friend, I remarked, "Here is Sauce Mussolini again." Before I could realize it a Fascist's wrath was upon me. The waiter had overheard my remark. He at once flashed his angry eyes toward me, assumed an aggressive attitude, threw the dishes about, and uttered as many invectives as he could think of. To the manager, who happened to pass by, he reported that I made fun of the Duce. The manager, an intelligent man, realized the situation, suppressed his smile, and walked off. The waiter's anger expended itself after a while.

Discretion Was Better.

At first I wanted to reply in kind, but did not know what Dr. Johnson's "parallelopipedon" would sound like in Italian. Finally I thought of the French, qui s'excuse, s'accuse, and laughed it off. But I didn't laugh until I got to our room.

Can anything be said in favor of verbal assault? A great deal, I think. In many cases it replaces physical violence. It is hard to tell what might happen to our politicians were they not masters of epithets. It is true that invectives take the place of thought, but they also supply a safety valve for passions. Recently I heard a clergyman call the freethinkers "freakthinkers." He received a round of applause. The instinct of aggressiveness was satisfied and everybody was happy. Like slandering, cursing and swearing, epithet-making is one of the prostituted functions of language. But it has some purging effects. It makes the good man a little less good and the bad man a little less bad.

SEEKING TO DEFINE LIBERTY

To the Editor of The New York Times:

F. J. Dundon in a letter to The Times objects to Mr. Coolidge's "definition of the liberty that the founders of the Republic, in his opinion, sought to realize through the Constitution, as a liberty 'under the law,' an 'ordered liberty'" and asks "If this is the correct definition of the liberty which they aimed to achieve, it is impossible to see what justification the Colonies had for their revolt against Great Britain, for liberty 'under the law' in the last analysis means only such liberty as the law may choose to allow * * * and clearly the Colonists before the Revolution enjoyed liberty 'under the law' just as their ancestors did under the persecutions of James and Elizabeth."

Overlooking the fact that Mr. Dundon overlooks some "persecutions" that were far worse than those under James and Elizabeth, let me call to him the fact that taxation and a number of other matters relating to government and trade were at the bottom of the trouble which caused the Colonists to take up arms against Great Britain long before any thought of independence was in the minds of any appreciable number of them. They knew there had to be laws relating to taxation and to commerce. They did not fight the laws as such. They were intelligent enough to know that no civilized community can get along without laws which are really understandings and agreements to act in certain ways under certain conditions for the greatest good of the greatest number.

What the Colonists did fight for was representation. They did not say Great Briltain should make no laws for them. They did say that she should make no laws affecting them, in the preparation, discussing and voting upon of which the Colonists should be without representation. The war cry was "No Taxation Without Representation."

The war started with the object of getting representation. It was only when much blood was shed and the feeling had gotten beyond all bounds that it was decided the Colonists could never again be part and parcel of the British Empire. The Declaration of Independence was signed well over a year after the first blood was shed.

FERTILIZERS

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The Times recently printed a letter entitled "Mr. Ford, the Farmers' Friend." The writer, Dan B. Sumner, states that it is not a question of who pays the highest price for Muscle Shoals but of who will make the most fertilizer there and sell it to the farmers at the lowest price. Mr. Sumner's statement represents the thought of many uninformed persons.

In the ten years since the Muscle Shoals plants were completed private enterprise has increased the production of nitrogen as contained in sulphate of ammonia from less than 23,000 tons to more than 187,000 tons. Sulphate of ammonia is the most important nitrogen carrier used in commercial fertilizer.

In 1919, furthermore, the United States produced 276 tons of synthetic nitrogen, whereas in 1929 84,000 tons were produced. This is merely evidence that private enterprise is now producing more than five times as much nitrogen as it was planned ever to produce at Muscle Shoals.

Mr. Sumner's reference to cheap fertilizer is also decidedly inappropriate. Fertilizers at the present moment are only 9 per cent above the five-year pre-war average, whereas non-agricultural commodities are approximately 46 per cent higher. All farm products are 31 per cent higher.

KELLOGG PEACE PACT VIEWED AS SANCTION OF SPECIFIC WARS

Due to Reservations, It Is Held, Popular Understanding of Treaty Is Wrong

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I was exceedingly interested to read a letter signed by James T. Shotwell, published in The Times, which was based upon the theory that because the Kellogg peace pact has been signed by so many nations of the world an adequate navy is no longer a real necessity, and for that reason I desire to call attention to the fact that instead of the pact being an outlawry of war, as is generally understood, it is, through the reservations made thereto, the most solemn sanction of specific wars that has ever been known in history.

These reservations, diplomatically termed "interpretative notes" and not appearing as such in the text of the pact, but in correspondence relative thereto between the various governments, and not included or explained when copies of the pact are handed to the public, have made it clear that the renunciation of war shall not apply in the following case:

1. In self-defense.
2. Against any State which breaks the treaty.
3. In execution of obligations under the League covenants.
4. In execution of obligations under the Locarno agreement.
5. In execution of obligations under treaties guaranteeing neutrality, which presumably includes the French alliances.

Such is the list of wars which the pact, in accordance with the notes referred to above, does not prohibit.

It is also particularly pertinent, in this connection, to call your attention to the provisions in Articles XVI and XVII of the League of Nations covenant. Article XVII of the covenant assumes jurisdiction over nonmembers for the purpose of settling disputes as follows:

"In the event of a dispute between a member of the League and a State which is not a member of the League, or between States not members of the League, the State or States not members of the League shall be invited to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, upon such conditions as the Council may deem just.

"If a State so invited shall refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, and shall resort to war against a member of the League, the provisions of Article XVI shall be applicable as against the State taking such action."

Defining Resort to War.

Article XVI of the covenant of the League of Nations, which by the above-quoted provisions in Article XVII is invoked for the purpose of compelling obedience by non-members as well as members, which would include the United States, provides that should a non-member nation resort to war, even to protect its interest against a member nation, it would "be deemed to have committed an act of war against all members of the League," and, to quote further from said article:

"It shall be the duty of the Council in such cases to recommend to the several governments concerned what effective military, naval or air force the members of the League shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the League."

It is clear, therefore, that, when these articles are read in connection with the interpretative notes to the Kellogg peace pact, not only does the said pact except such wars but the United States, although not a member of the League of Nations, is arbitrarily subjected to its jurisdiction.

Seeks Truth of Officials.

I challenge the Secretary of State to deny any of the above statements in regard to the Kellogg peace pact or the League of Nations, which can be proved by official documents from his own department, and I am at a loss to understand why government officials do not tell the truth and the whole truth to the American people, because an analysis of the treaty situation as it stands today shows that the United States has been trapped into the most serious position in its entire history.

It is extremely unfortunate that neither officials nor Senators will give sufficient consideration to the existing conditions to recognize that under the covenant of the League of Nations, as it stands today, we could not prevent a foreign power from establishing a base or colonizing in Mexico without subjecting ourselves, because of such a controversy, to the provisions of the covenant of the League of Nations, and by reference to Article XVII, quoted herein, it will be seen that, if we did not submit such a dispute as might arise under such a situation to the Council of the League of Nations but resorted to war to protect our interests under the Monroe Doctrine or otherwise, we would be held to have declared war "against all the members of the League of Nations."

It would not be difficult for any one who would give a moment's serious thought to the present status of our treaty relations to see how very serious it is. It is altogether incomprehensible that those Senators who are listening to all the various details regarding this present London naval treaty should utterly ignore the other phase of this situation, and permit themselves, through Utopian and impractical ideas of peace, to be led to reducing our navy until the nations of the world shall have eliminated the dangerous provisions of the League of Nations and abolished all exceptions to the Kellogg peace pact so that the "renunciation of war" shall mean just what it says.

BIRD-SAVER'S PARADISE

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I was seated on a perfect May day on my garden bench, which circles the trunk of a wide-spreading apple tree in the garden of my home in Northern New Jersey. The azaleas, dogwood, lilacs, hawthorne, columbines, German iris, tulips and daffodils were all in full flower. Feeding boxes were scattered about and a bird fountain close at hand.

These are the birds I saw close at hand:

White crowned sparrow
White throated sparrow
Chipping sparrow
Song sparrow
Field sparrow
English sparrow
Phoebe
Pair of titmouses
Pair of chickadees
Nuthatch
Redheaded woodpecker
Downy woodpecker
Bluejays
Catbirds
Robins—1 with white feathers in his tail
Brown thrasher
Verie
Wood thrush
Blackbird
Yellow-headed blackbird
Three or four different warblers that I do not know the names of Yellow finches
Towee
Pair of scarlet tanagers—the female willow green in contrast with the scarlet and black of her mate

These birds were dressed in their fresh Summer plumage and were as beautiful as the flowers which were in bloom. The catbirds kept up a continuous chorus that compares in beauty with the mocking bird of the South, in my opinion. No further comments are necessary to a lover of nature.

UNTOWARD EVENTS IN MISSOURI BANKS

State Bankers Consider Them and Search for a Way to Safeguard Depositors.

By LOUIS LACOSS.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

ST. LOUIS, May 28.—This is not a gloomy picture of hard times and public unrest, but it is a picture of an apprehensive state of mind here in regard to financial institutions. Indicative of its extent is the fact that the Missouri Bankers' Association, in session here this week, devoted many hours to an earnest discussion of how best the depositor may be protected.

During the past few months there has been a succession of events that have served to shake the public's confidence in the men and institutions it has regarded as safe keepers of savings and investments. There have been a dozen and more important embezzlements by trusted officers of banks, in St. Louis and elsewhere in the State. An investment company with headquarters in St. Louis, a branch office in Kansas City and aggressive salesmen all over the State crashed a few days ago and a final check-up will probably reveal that purchasers of worthless securities stand to lose upward of $2,000,000.

The head of a life insurance company which sold policies all over the Middle West was only recently sentenced to an extended term in the penitentiary after it was discovered that he had wrecked the company. A prominent citizen of St. Louis, an active church worker, is now in prison after pleading guilty to selling his friends some $200,000 worth of securities that would not stand legal inquiry. The vice president of a local bank has just been indicted on charges of embezzlement, and the $50,000 loss has been ascribed to his desire to finance a private enterprise in the East on money "borrowed" from various accounts in his bank.

Safety Vaults Looted.

A few days ago robbers entered a St. Louis bank, looted the safe deposit vaults and made off with jewels, cash and other valuables estimated at $200,000 or more. Robberies are common, but in this instance the president of the bank disclaimed any liability on the part of his institution for the losses, and the persons who deposited their valuables in strong boxes under the presumption that they were protected against thieves will probably have to go to court for redress. The banker may be within his rights, as safe deposit renters sign a contract releasing the bank from obligation in cases of theft, but in this specific robbery it has been pointed out that inadequate police protection was afforded by the bank.

And just the other day another bank failed in Missouri, this time in Knox County. It was the twenty-ninth bank that has closed its doors in the State this year. Across the river in South Illinois there have been several bank failures, especially in the hard-hit coal mining towns of West Frankfort and Marion.

Depositors may or may not lose their money eventally. Probably in most instances after vexing delays they will receive most or all of their money. But every crash, every embezzlement, every criminal charge laid against trusted officers of banks and investment companies causes the man or woman who has funds beyond the bare cash needed for current expenses to question the stability of the institutions that have hitherto been regarded as bulwarks of safety.

Adequate Protection Discussed.

Missouri bankers took cognizance of the situation when they devoted a great part of their discussions to adequate protection to the depositor. One of the visiting bankers, the president of a bank in Bonne Terre, a mining community, voiced the sentiments of all when he declared that a "bank is a quasi-public utility, the custodian of the funds of the people who cannot afford to lose their accumulated savings."

"We must be prepared to return those funds when called for," he said. "Public belief in our ability to do so is the basis of our success."

Benjamin E. Young, controller of the Commerce Trust Company, Kansas City, said:

"A bank, if healthy, must make money and from the money it makes should provide an adequate loss reserve. Any bank, if it serves its community properly, will have losses. These losses should be anticipated. The loss factor itself is not in most cases dangerous. It is the failure to dispose of losses promptly, due to a lack of accumulated earnings with which to absorb them, that embarrasses banks."

All of this does not mean that depositors in Missouri and South Illinois are rushing to the banks to withdraw their savings, or that they are refusing to purchase securities of any nature. But it does mean that the epidemic of irregularities in institutions in which they have had implicit faith, although such irregularities for the most part have caused them no personal loss, has caused the man in the street to wonder whether his money is safe.

It is not a savory situation. The result is an obvious tightening up in all banking lines which, after all, will probably work for the ultimate benefit of all concerned.

Buttons From Mussel Shells.

BUREAU OF FISHERIES figures show that 20,205,073 gross of finished pearl buttons, valued at $5,795,863, were produced from the shells of fresh-water mussels last year. The manufacture required 84,352,000 pounds of shells with a value to the fishermen of $1,324,919.

Legal Comment on Current Events

Supreme Court's "Liquor Buyer's" Decision Held Only to Uphold Congress' Intent—No Exoneration of Purchaser Implied.

Edited by Current Events Committee of American Association of Legal Authors.

THE RECENT "liquor buyer's" decision of the United States Supreme Court has been as widely discussed as its underlying theory and immediate effects have been misunderstood and misstated. The Supreme Court did not exonerate purchasers of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes because a contrary course would create a crime by construction or implication; that tribunal did not declare that a purchaser was not guilty of a crime primarily because sales only and not purchases were among the expressly prohibited acts in respect of beverage liquor; nor was the decision made to rest upon the phrasing of the Eighteenth Amendment of the Constitution, which prohibits, in addition to imports and exports, only manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicants.

What the Supreme Court did was to refuse to follow the strict letter of Section 6 of the Prohibition Act, expressly prohibiting the purchase of liquor without a permit, by limiting that section to transactions of a character which might be so legalized, the permit provisions of the act being held inapplicable to transactions between a bootlegger and his customer.

Question of Intention.

The outstanding feature of the decision, which, in its application to purchasers of bootleg liquor, merely confirmed the understanding of the act and the enforcement methods which have prevailed from the outset, was that it illustrates anew that "the great fundamental rule in construing statutes is to ascertain and give effect to the intention of the legislature." It is this rule which prevents the operation of a statute upon a case within the words but not within the purpose of the law, which follows the spirit or reason of the law in preference to its letter, which considers the legislative policy and purpose, the effects and consequences of an enactment, its reasonable implications and inferences. One of the most important of the judicial functions is the interpretation of statutes by the application of this rule.

Such assertions as that the decision has caused general jubilation among the wets and profound consternation among the drys are hyperbole for popular consumption. Justice Sutherland called attention to the fact that it was conceded by the government "that during the entire life of the National Prohibition act, a period of ten years, the executive departments charged with the administration and enforcement of the act have uniformly construed it as not including the purchaser.

Possessors and Conspirators.

A LEADING newspaper recently declared, in comment upon the Farrar decision, "the general assumption has been that the Volstead law prohibited possession in every sense of the word." There could be no such assumption in the mind of any one who had read Section 33 of the act.

A Washington newspaper correspondent, whose dispatch received extensive publicity, predicted that now that liquor buyers have been exculpated by the Supreme Court, "a test case based on the theory of possession, following proof of sale by a bootlegger," will be the next step of the Department of Justice. But there have been dozens of cases in which "possession" has been punished as a crime, and this, though "possession" is not forbidden by the Eighteenth Amendment. "Possession" is, of course, forbidden by the prohibition act, except under permit or in the home.

But the question whether one who purchases intoxicating liquor, stipulating that it shall be shipped to his residence, is guilty of criminal conspiracy to transport remains unanswered. Unfortunately, the United States Supreme Court decided the Norris case, in which such issue was thought to be involved, on a technicality and not upon the merits.

Bootlegger's Offenses.

It is clear, however, that a bootlegger who sells intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, and who then transports it to the home of the purchaser, commits two offenses: (1) sale and (2) transportation. The buyer may lawfully purchase but may not lawfully transport and, in the view of many, may not lawfully agree with the seller that liquor purchased is to be transported to the purchaser's home. That is, it may be rather logically argued that a contract to sell, an incident of which is an agreement to transport, is, in the eye of the law, a conspiracy to transport and, therefore, a conspiracy to commit a crime. Upon this point, the judges of the lower courts have disagreed. Should liquor buyers requiring delivery at their homes be held conspirators to transport by the United States Supreme Court, where the question must soon be settled, then indeed would the ardent and aggressive drys be furnished with a new and sharp weapon for the enforcement of prohibition.

Motor Mishaps and Bumblebees.

DURING the busy season for bees, which in some sections of the country is just now beginning, automobile accidents occur occasionally from a cause not classified in any of the official complications of statistics, so far as has been noted, but yet of sufficient importance to justify this comment.

Last August Mr. and Mrs. Louis Greenberg of New Rochelle, N. Y., were driving together in an automobile when a bumblebee flew into Mr. Greenberg's face. He lost control of his automobile, which left the road and crashed into a telephone pole. Mrs. Greenberg suffered a broken neck, from which she died within twenty minutes after reaching the Batavia Hospital.

Ten days ago an almost identical accident happened near New Castle, Pa. Mr. and Mrs. L. W. Bartlett of that city were also driving in a car. Because Mr. Bartlett took one hand off the wheel to ward off a bumblebee, control was lost of the automobile, which, like the Greenberg car, crashed into a wayside pole, causing the death of the wife of the owner within four hours after the smash-up.

Cases involving liability for automobile injuries, where the driver has lost control of his machine due to a bee sting, or because of the presence of a bee in the automobile, while rare, have found their way to the courts. Such cases should teach motorists that there is a danger from this source and of the importance of presence of mind in the presence of bees. When motoring through the open spaces of the country in balmy breezes, traversing bordering green pastures and fields carpeted with wild flowers, one should prepare one's consciousness for an occasional visitation from a bee. If such an event is terrifying, stop the car gradually and the bee will buzz away again. Otherwise, and with great deliberation, brush the uninvited visitor from the car when it has been stopped by the side of the road.

Injuries to Guest in Automobile.

THE SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN passed upon a bee case last Summer, the driver of an automobile having been sued by a guest for injuries which, according to the statement of the driver of the car, occurred this way: He, the driver, was looking ahead, watching the road, with both hands on the steering wheel, when an occupant of the car called his attention to the fact that there was a bee on his arm; that, keeping his left hand on the steering wheel, he struck at the bee with his right hand, at the same time looking at the bee instead of at the road for the space of a few seconds. Just at this time the car struck a soft spot in the road with loose gravel upon it, the steering wheel was twisted from the grasp of the driver's left hand, the car veered toward the side of the road, its right wheels sinking in soft earth on the edge of the road, where the machine overturned. Before the effort was made to kill the bee, the car had been traveling at twenty to twenty-five miles an hour over a hard-surfaced State highway.

The Court's Decision.

The court held in this case that it was for the jury to decide whether the conduct of the driver of the automobile in attempting to strike a bee on his left arm with his right hand on the steering wheel, with the car still moving, was such negligence as would render him liable in damages for injuries to his guest. In this case, also, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin repudiated the more reasonable doctrine, which exists in some of the other States, that "the owner or driver of an automobile upon the public highways owes to a gratuitous guest the duty of exercising ordinary care to avoid personal injury to him." Instead of this rule, Justice Stevens, writing the opinion, declared that the duty which a host owes to an automobile guest "calls for the slightest degree of care in any human relation," explained to mean that no liability arises except for gross negligence. "The duty so devolving upon the driver of the car," declared Justice Stevens, "is said to be not to increase the danger or to add a new one."

FARMERS IN TEXAS LOOK FOR RELIEF

Cotton Growers Doubt Value of Cooperative Scheme of the Government.

By IRVIN S. TAUBKIN.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

DALLAS, Texas, May 26.—The Texas cotton farmer is asking where is this farm relief he has heard the Republican Administration talk about so much? The impression he has is that, so far, it has been a dismal failure. Past performances of cotton cooperatives here have not been such as to impress him nor give him too sanguine an attitude about their future. Despite the high-powered sales talk which he has been fed he has the idea that the relief is the same he has had many times in the past—nine-tenths politics and one-tenth economics, and rather doubtful economics at that.

A siege of unusually heavy rains and floods in the last few weeks may come to the government machinery's rescue of the first cotton crop with which it has anything to do. The rains have washed out the seed over a large section of the cotton belt. In much of it the third planting is now being done. This means a late crop, and late crops are more susceptible to boll weevil than early crops. The net result may be a better price for cotton, and with a better price the farmer is not so likely to see the relief deficiences, nor care quite so much about them.

The sales talk up to this time is as nothing to what must follow. The cooperative idea has to be sold to the cotton farmer all over again. Not only must the new idea be sold, but the old, with its almost terrible tradition of failure here, must be removed from the farmers' minds.

The New Contract.

The new idea, although termed "revolutionary" by its proponents, is really nothing but a compromise. It was tried out last year in Arkansas—which contributes but little to the whole cotton crop—with, it is said, some success. It throws overboard entirely the Sapiro idea and gets the farmer's name signed to a part-crop contract. In Texas the contract which has been drawn up requires delivery of every other bale ginned until a total of ten bales has been delivered. Formerly the cooperative contract signed up all the farmer's production, and the idea was so unsuccessful that only 5 per cent of Texas cotton farmers were so obligated. That is, only 5 per cent lived up to these obligations.

Thousands of others were under such contracts, but the Texas Farm Bureau Cotton Association is said to have been so mishandled that the farmers disregarded their contracts and sold their cotton in the open market. They were impelled to do this, too, under the lash of the credit system which operates here. Most cotton crops are mortgaged to the bankers, and Texas bankers want their money without reference to when the cooperative can pay it.

After delivery of the minimum obligation under the new cooperative contract, the farmer may either sell his cotton to the cooperative association or on the open market. It means that the cooperative, the government agency, is in open competition with private interests.

The cooperative movement, through activity of the new principles in it, is attracting the interest, at any rate, of a class hitherto strange in cooperatives—big business leaders and shrewd bankers. Big farmers, too, who heretofore have scorned cooperatives, are manifesting interest.

The attitude toward this farm relief is one doubtful of its value. Agricultural experts here have already declared that it is doomed to failure.

Turkish Deputy Tells How President Kemal Started Revolution in Anatolia by a Ruse

his momentous voyage. While proceeding up the Bosporus the ship was hailed and compelled to anchor. Police came aboard and examined all passengers. Kemal became nervous and begged the captain to continue the voyage. The latter demurred but Kemal insisted, and by late evening the Pandirma was in the Black Sea. A heavy sea was running and the ship's compasses were defective. Kemal was apprehensive and urged the captain to follow the coast, thus dodging warships which had been sent after the Pandirma but which were unable to steam so near land.

After two or three anxious days Samsoun was reached and what followed is well known. Kemal, instead of exterminating the irregular bands, reorganized them and gradually raised an army which drove the Greeks into the sea at Smyrna, liberated Turkey from all foreigners and proclaimed Kemal ruler and virtually dictator of the country.

Touring Clubs Convene.

On the day after these lines are published the annual congress of international touring clubs will be opened in Istanbul. Delegates from all of the more important countries of the world will attend the meeting, which will be held in the Dolma Bagtache Palace and will last three days. A program of sightseeing has been arranged for the delegates and the Turkish authorities will do some lavish entertaining.

Turkey has, in fact, started to take a keen, though somewhat belated, interest in tourists. Reched Safvet Bey, who is president of the Turkish Touring Club, has been especially active in propaganda designed to make Turkey known abroad.

Many difficulties, unfortunately, beset tourists visiting this country. First, there are several so-called military and naval zones near Istanbul which foreigners are forbidden to cross. These cover a large area in Western Thrace and Anatolia and make access to Istanbul in automobiles from either east or west very complicated. Motorists wishing to traverse Istanbul en route to Europe or Asia are obliged to confide their automobiles to the tender mercies of local chauffeurs or ship them by rail. Similar restrictions apply to motorists who wish to drive from Istanbul to Angora, Turkey's new capital.

Local Passports Needed.

Another nuisance which constantly causes complaints among travelers paying short visits to Turkey is the necessity of obtaining local passports (styled visiko) and delivering several photographs to the police. This procedure is aggravated if one wants to travel in the interior. Tourists visiting Turkish ports on ships do not escape these formalities and shipping agents state that some foreign lines avoid Turkey on account of the annoying formalities encountered. It is sincerely hoped that the congress of touring clubs will be able to devise some means of overcoming or at least lessening these hindrances to travel. The idea underlying all these precautions is presumably to keep foreigners from obtaining knowledge of military, naval or other secrets. It can confidently be asserted that not one in a thousand tourists has the slightest interest in such matters. Spies and similar characters will always be able to ferret out such secrets. What Turkey needs is money, and tourists, who mostly come from America, England, Germany and the Scandinavian countries, can prove a very useful source of revenue if they are properly treated.

SWEEPSTAKES CUT IN ENGLISH DERBY

Betting on the Famous Race at Epsom Next Wednesday Is Dealt a Hard Blow.

By HAYDEN CHURCH.

LONDON.

"ABOUT two minutes, thirty-five seconds of concentrated excitement, with millions of pounds hanging in the balance." Thus somebody summed up the English Derby, and the "concentrated excitement" undoubtedly will be perceptible when the most important horserace in the world is run for the 146th time at Epsom next Wednesday afternoon. But the "millions of pounds" will be short by several millions of their accustomed total.

The Derby of 1930, in fact, promises to be shorn of a good deal of its interest owing to the unexpected action of the authorities with regard to sweepstakes, which is going to keep a large amount of money from being won and lost.

A couple of months ago the Home Secretary dropped a bombshell among the organizers, patrons and beneficiaries of Derby "sweeps" by announcing that hereafter all sweepstakes must be strictly private, that is, confined strictly to the members of the club, society or other body by which they were organized, and that prosecutions would be instituted promptly against the promotors of any that were found to be selling tickets to the general public. Hitherto, though all Derby "sweeps" were ostensibly private, the bulk of the tickets in many were bought by the general public, and the result of the Home Secretary's fiat has been that the "subscriptions" to, and consequently the prizes in, such sweeps all over the country have shrunk to mere skeletons of their normal aggregates.

The biggest of all the English "sweeps" is that organized by the London Stock Exchange, and what has befallen that ordinarily gigantic gamble is typical of what has happened to all.

Last year, when, as usual, the majority of ticket-holders were persons having no direct connection with the Stock Exchange, the subscriptions amounted to $5,000,000. The first prize was $625,000 and the second $320,000.

This year, owing to the new restrictions, the subscriptions amount to only $335,000; the first prize is $105,000, and the second $50,000.

All over England the story is the same. The big Derby "sweeps" in which the public previously could buy tickets have dwindled to mere ghosts of themselves.

This year the prizes offered by the northern clubs are exceedingly small in comparison with those of last year. So it is not surprising that the Home Secretary's fiat is regarded by a considerable section of the public as little short of a national calamity.

Several big "sweeps" have had to be abandoned altogether. Among these is the one organized by the meat-sellers of Smithfield Market, London, for the benefit of St. Bartholomew's Hospital and the Royal Northern Hospital's sweepstake.

As a proportion of the takings of almost every big "sweep" is devoted to charity—the Stock Exchange contributed $500,000 to charities last year and will be able to contribute only $35,000 this year—not only will millions of Britons be deprived of their annual gamble but hospitals and other institutions throughout the country will be poorer by millions of dollars.

Sweepstakes or no sweepstakes, however, the Derby is always the Derby, and this year's great racing carnival on Epsom Downs is going to be notable in several ways. Among other things it will go down to history as the first Derby at which the totalisator was used.

New Tariff Bill's Meaning to the Consumer Brought Out by Its Author and a Democrat

illustrations. When duties were imposed upon these articles it was argued by our opponents that prices would be greatly increased. The fact is that you can now buy American tin and aluminum wares of better quality and heavier weight cheaper here than anywhere else.

A price may be increased to the full amount of the duty or to a part of it or may not increase at all. Prices may even decline; this is a common experience, especially under mass production. Which of these alternatives will apply depends on the markets and other economic factors, whose future operations can only be estimated on the basis of past experiences.

This outcry that costs to American consumers will be increased at all times by the full amount of the duties, and probably much further increased by what is vaguely called "pyramiding," has always been raised, but this has not been our experience, for if this were true each protective tariff act would not have multiplied production, increased employment, consumed enormous quantities of raw materials, fostered trade and commerce at home and abroad, sustained extensive and costly systems of public and private improvements and, in a word, promoted and maintained the general prosperity.

It has been asserted that the pending bill proposes the highest rates of duty in our history. "Let facts be submitted to a candid world." Since 1890 six tariff acts have been put on the statute books, four by the Republicans and two by the Democrats; the figures I now give relate to dutiable imports only.

Under the Republican protective tariffs, the weighted average ad valorems on dutiable imports are as follows, for the whole period each was in force:

		Per Cent.
McKinley act	1890-1894	48.39
Dingley act	1897-1909	46.49
Payne act	1909-1913	40.73
Fordney act	1922-1930	38.22
Pending bill	1930	41.22

That is, the ad valorem under the pending bill, based upon 1928 dutiable imports is 7.17 per cent below the McKinley act, 5.27 per cent below the Dingley act, .49 per cent above the Payne act, and 2.47 per cent above the ad valorem of the Fordney act, for the year 1928, which is the year on which the computations are based for the pending bill. Under each of the above acts the country enjoyed an increasing and continued prosperity. Whether the rates were higher or lower than those now proposed, each served its purpose well. It is in the memory of all that the Underwood free trade act resulted in national distress.

Our foreign trade includes both imports and exports, and the average ad valorems on all imports, both free and dutiable, under protective tariff are as follows:

	Per Cent.
McKinley act	23.01
Dingley act	25.47
Payne act	19.32
Fordney act	13.83
Pending bill	15.97

The pending bill is therefore lower than all others on all imports combined, excepting on the Fordney act. The two items to which the increase in the pending bill are specially due are the greatly increased rates on agricultural products and transfers from the free list. For the relief of agriculture in addition to an increase in rates, the bill proposes to stimulate and make profitable the growth of products not now grown in quantities sufficient for our requirements, and so reduce the amount of crops now grown in excess of such requirements.

The average ad valorem for dutiable imports entered in 1928, if computed on the rates in the pending bill, is 41.22 per cent or an increase of 2.47 per cent over the average ad valorems for the year 1928, under the present law. Distributing this increase between imports due to agriculture and all other imports, and taking into consideration that the increase in ad valorems on agricultural items is three times that on all other imports not related to agriculture, and also taking into consideration the amounts of dutiable imports under each it is apparent that of this increase of 2.49 per cent, 1.54 per cent is for agriculture and .95 per cent for all other industries. This is further borne out by the statement of the Tariff Commission that 68 per cent of the increases are related to agriculture and 32 per cent to all other industries.

There has been a tendency during the consideration of the bill for some producers to contend for satisfactory readjustments in rates affecting them, and to oppose similar consideration for other producers. It has, however, been the policy of those in charge of the legislation to accord equal consideration to all, believing this to be a just national policy, and that a partial prosperity cannot be maintained.

After long and detailed consideration, I am led to the conclusion that the changes made in rates of duties are justified and in the public interest.

GERMANY HAILS LIST OF VEREINS

Huge Directory Gives Account of All Societies, Many of Them With Odd Titles.

MEMBERS of the German vereins—and almost every German is a member of one or more vereins—are rejoicing over the appearance of the first "Directory of Vereins," a theoretically complete list of all the societies, associations, leagues and unions which exist in the republic.

A 490-page volume was required for all the organizations, the names and purposes of many of which are a constant source of amusement to non-members. There is, for instance, the "League for the German Outlook on Life," the "German Emergency League Against the Black Disgrace" and the "League for Defense of the Negro Races." Then there is a verein for the support of aged midwives and the "Company of the Friends of the Valley of the River Lahn." And if any one should suggest that a connection existed between the verein for bachelors and the verein for beauty contests he would undoubtedly be sued by the league against libel.

Most thriving vereins organized for the same purpose are combined into verbands which in turn are joined together into "Reichsverbände."

BIG VOTE EXPECTED IN NORTH CAROLINA

have at least approached the scurrilous.

The prohibition question has played its part in the campaign, but has had a far different rôle from that given to it in New Jersey and elsewhere. There is a third candidate for the Democratic nomination, Thomas L. Estep, a mountaineer physician and an avowed wet. But no one expects him to receive more than 5,000 of the 300,000 or more votes which will be cast in the Democratic primary.

Regularity the Trump Card.

Except for counter-attacks on the prohibition issue, the Bailey forces have concentrated their efforts on the 1928 Simmons bolt, although they are relying heavily on dissatisfaction with Senator Simmons, which existed prior to that year. However, their principal card is party regularity, which heretofore has always been the ace of trumps.

The Simmons forces have met the attack in a variety of ways. One course has been that what Senator Simmons did in 1928 was right and proper, and in that connection there has been much use of the words "Raskob" and "Tammany."

But, after all, the question to be settled on June 7 is, Can the county leaders lead? Over against them is the unpopularity of Smith with the mass of the voters, and the Simmons prestige.

We Are Building an Institution in Radio

AT the General Motors Radio Corporation we have laid the foundation of a permanent, progressive business—and on this groundwork we are already raising the structure of an institution with ideals and ambitions quite different from those the radio industry has known ⸱ The men who represent us to you—our dealers—have met requirements which establish them, beyond doubt, as trustworthy, reputable merchants ⸱ Our product is distinctive in its design, in its appearance and in the way it performs ⸱ It reflects, we believe, the extraordinary value that our resources and our experience and our manufacturing abilities help us to create ⸱ We want you to prefer this product . . . and to base your preference as much on your confidence in the dealer who sells it and in us who make it, as on your appraisal of the product itself.

The General Motors Radio Corporation entered the radio field with the purpose of providing more for the radio buyer than he previously had been offered. Some of the ablest engineers in the radio industry were called upon to design a chassis capable of exceptional performance even in these times of fine radio reception. The Tone Selector was developed—so that you might "tune" your General Motors Radio to please your ear—emphasizing the degree of bass or treble you prefer, simply by turning a knob. General Motors' vast experience in precision methods was concentrated on every step in the manufacturing process so that you might expect a product thoroughly well-built, dependable and lasting.

The same consideration for the buyer is evident in our policy regarding cabinets. In appearance the models of the new General Motors Radio are truly admirable adaptations of authentic period furniture. And in order that you may consider them as permanent possessions—as you would any example of fine cabinetwork—any new developments in chassis or speaker will be designed so as to permit installation in these present cabinets, thus enabling you to enjoy future improvements at the lowest possible cost.

Believing that no sale is quite complete without a background of service, we have instituted a service organization of national scope. Wherever you buy a new General Motors Radio, its continued satisfactory performance will be vouched for by a corps of trained radio technicians—expert, capable, and always within ready reach.

We, the General Motors Radio Corporation, have developed these thoroughly fine radios and radio-phonographs . . . established a reputable, responsible organization of exclusive dealers . . . instituted national service . . . pledged ourselves to progressive manufacturing policies and conservative business principles—all, that you may find in radio the same assurance of value, of permanence and of fair-dealing that "Product of General Motors" has come to mean in other fields.

We ask you to judge the sincerity of our purpose and the value of our product by calling on the nearest authorized General Motors Radio dealer in your community. His name appears below.

BRIAND: A MAN OF THE PEOPLE

The French Foreign Minister Portrayed by His Boswell

BRIAND: MAN OF PEACE. By Valentine Thomson. New York: Covici-Friede. $5.

By L. V. UPDEGRAFF

IT is not strange that Aristide Briand, now advanced by length of service and the list of his achievements to first place among European statesmen, should have remained a more or less obscure personage to foreigners. For his success in politics seems to have been due to a rare ability to have his own way without playing the master. Thus he has never been a centre of attention like Clemenceau, for example, or even Poincaré, the only two French political figures who could rank with him in the history of the war and reconstruction.

The silence which shrouded "The Tiger" for ten years has been shattered to bits, and the echoes of that explosion are still reverberating. M. Poincaré has written his memoirs with that exhaustive and painstaking care for which he is noted. It is therefore of great interest that M. Briand, who hates writing of any sort and who will probably leave little by way of memoirs, should have found in Miss Thomson a kind of Boswell to report some of his conversations and to set him out in the proper relation to the stirring times in which he has lived.

By way of revelation of State secrets, of "hidden chapters" of personalities and polemics, there is much less to be found here than in other recent books by and about the leading figures of war days in France. That, too, is in character. The "man of peace" has fewer sensations up his sleeves than the warrior-politician. Briand's conversations are lively and interesting, touching lightly on men and events, illuminating his peace program and revealing many phases of a mind which is unique in its attributes of cynic and mystic, its disillusionment and its faith.

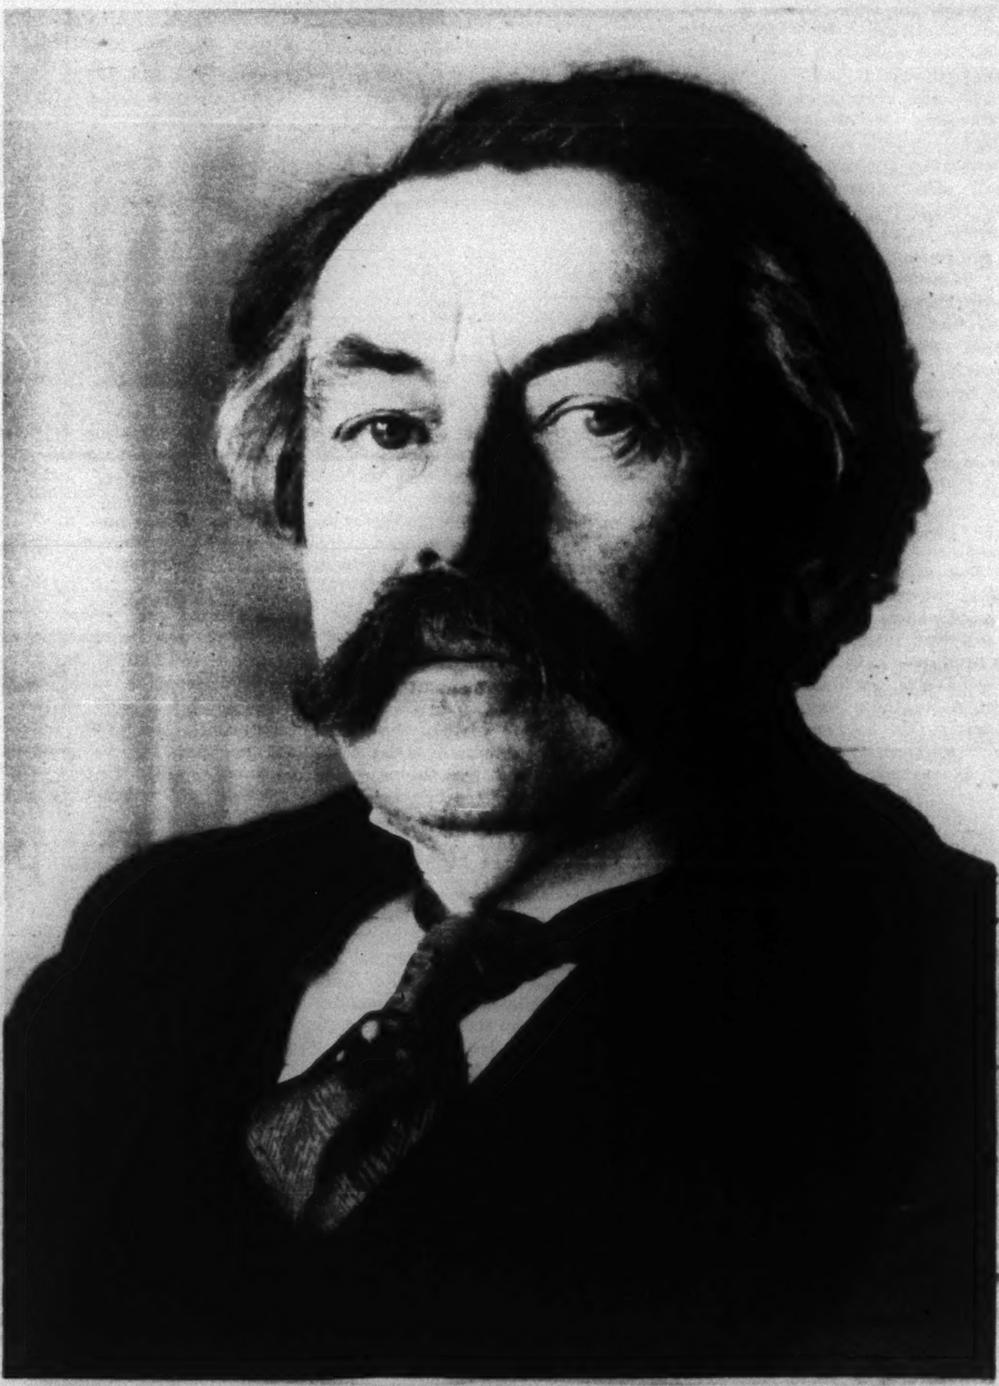
Although M. Briand as the architect of European peace has now advanced to the stage of presenting to the powers a plan of European federation, it is needful to recall that he began life as a fighter. He passed through the phases of many French public men—from revolutionary Socialist to safe-and-sane Republican. He took part in such notable political affairs as the Church and State separation and the Dreyfus case on the side of the liberals. Rather early in his career he reached the goal of Cabinet rank and the Premier's office—the latter a position he has now held an even dozen times.

The war had the effect of turning Briand's mind away from social questions to the problems of world peace with which his name is now first of all associated. Miss Thomson records a conversation in the early days of the war in which his ideas of a reorganization of European peace were first foreshadowed.

> The great thing to do [said Briand] would be to create a new Europe where such aggressions would be impossible. If in the first days of the war all nations had been in accord and had seen clearly what Germany was up to, some action might have been taken to stop her. * * * The important thing would be to create a meeting ground for nations * * * a defense against brutal attacks. * * * A nation has as much right to live as an individual.

During the last years of the war, after Clemenceau had come into power on the simple platform, "Je fais la guerre," Briand, excluded from the Cabinet, had time to ponder deeply on how he would make the peace. Although Clemenceau had attacked Briand without mercy during the latter's term as Premier, it was typical of the "man of peace" to speak out when Clemenceau presented the treaty of Versailles to the Chamber:

> The treaty of peace has been elaborated among the greatest difficulties. I have too often suffered myself from unjust criticism to act in that way toward others. I know too well what difficulties have to be met and what concessions have to be made to be astonished when others fail to achieve the maximum.



Aristide Briand.

Briand's real reply to Clemenceau came a short time later when he helped to defeat "The Tiger" for the Presidency of the republic. Clemenceau went into a strenuous retirement and Briand launched out on the career of European peacemaker which continues unabated. He has received some checks like the sudden recall from the Cannes conference with Lloyd George when Poincaré stepped in. "Briand," says Miss Thomson, "still laughs when he speaks of that golf party and the excitement that it aroused."

He returned to influence under the Herriot Government and fathered the Geneva protocol which, though never satisfied, advanced Europe toward the Locarno treaties which stand out as Briand's master stroke. The Kellogg-Briand anti-war pact resulted from an interview Briand gave to The Associated Press on the tenth anniversary of America's declaration of war. The idea was slowly worked out over a year and a half. By similar slow steps the proposals for a federated Europe have been presented and reduced at last to definite form.

> Peace [said Briand] is an exacting mistress, still more exacting than war. You are carried to war by events that overpower you, that drag people into it without leaving them time for reflection, but peace demands a more continued and tenacious devotion; she wants a persistent effort and she doesn't admit any feeling of doubt.

M. Briand has served peace, the exacting mistress, with more success than the god of war. During his brief term in office in the war years he congratulates himself on having adhered to the "eastern front" school. He has told a story of his clash with Lord Kitchener in an allied council of war when the British soldier pointed a stern finger at him and declared: "That long-haired advocate is actually forcing us to lose the war."

Briand later heard his own name praised as "the man of Saloniki" when the allies broke through that front at last and hastened the German collapse.

M. Briand has become almost a permanent Foreign Minister of France. He lives in an apartment in the Foreign Office where the wind in the trees reminds him of his old home in Brittany. "I like a quiet life," he tells his friends, and at odd moments he slips away to his farm in Normandy to look after his crops and fish in a little river.

From a long acquaintance with M. Briand, Miss Thomson, daughter of a former French Minister of Marine and a colleague of Briand, writes his life with interesting personal glimpses which have been denied to the journalistic observers of the statesman in action. Briand's best talk is not of haute politique but of his boyhood in Brittany and his early battles as a revolutionary Socialist. One of the interesting anecdotes here preserved is of Briand's youthful acquaintance with Jules Verne.

> I have a very vivid memory of his home [Briand said]. Its atmosphere was unimaginably provincial and ordinary. * * * I recall he had a number of blackboards on the wall. On these he had written many formulae. * * * All his calculations were exact. They have since been verified, and now the wonders that were worked out on those blackboards are matters of actual occurrence. * * * He was a good soul, a good, calm, little bourgeois.

Verne repaid the admiration of the youthful Briand by making him the hero of one of his books.

The secret of Briand's success in democratic France may be in the first and the last word Miss Thomson has to say about him in this biography, namely, that Briand began and has remained a man of the people. His hatred of war is a hatred he shares with the peasant on the land and the small bourgeois in his shop. The farmers of his North accept him as one of them whenever he wishes.

Like Lincoln, Briand builds political policy on the firm foundation of an intimate understanding of people. If he has widened his peace policy to include Germans as well as French, it is because he has correctly understood that the German peasant and the German worker have as great a stake in preventing war as the French peasant and the French worker.

Richard Aldington and Frances Winwar Offer Modern Versions of the Classic Tales

THE DECAMERON OF GIOVANNI BOCCACCIO. Translated by Richard Aldington. Illustrated by Jean de Bosschere. New York: Covici, Friede. $17.50.

THE DECAMERON OF GIOVANNI BOCCACCIO. Translated by Frances Winwar. With an Introduction by Burton Rascoe. New York: The Limited Editions Club. $10.

By THOMAS CALDECOT CHUBB

IN the year 1348, Europe, Italy, and in consequence, "the notable city of Florence, fair above every other in Italy," were visited by a mighty affliction.

This was that almost unprecedented outburst of virulent contagious disease which is known variously as the Great Plague or as the Black Death. It broke out by the China Sea, reached the shores of the Mediterranean overland, was carried from Asia Minor to Pisa "by certain Genovese and Catalan galleys" and never really did burn out entirely until almost modern times, though it became sporadic rather than sweeping very shortly, probably from lack of fuel.

It is estimated that it destroyed 25,000,000 human lives, and probably came closer to wiping out the entire human race than anything that has happened before or since. Even greater were its moral consequences. There were, of course, some who saw in it the hand of deity, scourging men for their misdeeds, and these were frightened into repentance. Most, however, found it but an emphatic reminder that life was short, and death gloomy and final. These threw every standard overboard. Of the substitution of pagan for monastic standards, which marked the transition from the Middle Ages to the Renaissance, it was, therefore, an exceedingly important cause.

And it happens that it is rather better known to us than many of the great catastrophic events which have bewildered humanity. Just as the eruption of Vesuvius which destroyed Pompeii and Herculaneum was witnessed by the younger Pliny, so the plague had for an onlooker a young man who was rapidly gathering power to describe it. Though he was in Naples at the time, he was the son of a Florentine banker. His name was Giovanni Boccaccio, and he had probably long been looking for something around which to assemble the series of gay tales—drawn from his reading, his own life, and from anecdotes related to him—which we know must have been accumulating in his mind or in his notebooks.

Now, using as his narrators, three young men—each probably representing an aspect of himself—and seven young women—who may have been his various lady loves—who had fled to Fiesole to escape the plague, he started weaving them together. This task supposedly took five years, and in that case the book was completed in 1353 when he was forty. It has become known—whether or not that was the title he himself chose for it—as "The Decameron," and "contrary to the experience of most classics"—to use the apt words of Professor Arthur Livingstone—"it has been read by more people than confess to it."

Nor is this very surprising, when you consider its many-sided appeal. To the lover of the Middle Ages it conveys the most brightly-colored and vivid picture of that whole animated period that can be found anywhere. To the connoisseur of great prose it offers very nearly the warmest and the most artfully contrived prose ever written. It has inspired—and given material to—such a wide range of writers as Madame de Sevigné, Swift, La Fontaine, Goethe, Shakespeare, Molière, Chaucer, Keats, Byron and Longfellow—to name but a handful. Most of all, however, it is one of the merriest and most entertaining collection of tales ever penned by hand of mortal. With its pace, color, humor, irony, and its well-controlled sophistication, it is hard to imagine a really civilized person who could read it without joy.

It is of this book that we are offered almost simultaneously two brand-new translations. They were badly needed. Of the two complete translations hitherto available to modern readers, one—that by Rigg—is heavy and somewhat lifeless; the other—by John Payne—though faithful to the rhythm of Boccaccio, is spoiled for many by its artificially archaic language. Both of these new translations are excellent.

Between the two, there is very little to choose. Miss Winwar's method is a good deal more revolutionary, though it has been applied recently and even more drastically to Rabelais. In effect, it is this. Boccaccio wrote a gay, informal, entertaining collection of tales which were intended for amusement rather than as literature. At least in dialogue, he interspersed his sculptured prose with the more racy vocabulary of the street, not to say the gutter. He used idiom slang and jargon. Like John M. Synge, he must have listened through a chink in the floor so that he could "hear what was being said in the kitchen." In consequence, the only way to translate him is by using modern language. If in doing this Miss Winwar has lost one part of the Boccaccian charm of style—namely, his involved and cadenced formalism—she has achieved swiftness, vigor and vividness. And only on very rare occasions has she overdone herself and made thieves and bullies in Naples talk rather more like United States marines.

Mr. Aldington's way of approach is similar. He, too, has tried to convey "The Decameron" in language that is entirely natural. Being a poet, he has had a slightly more accurate feeling for beauty than Miss Winwar, and in that respect his translation is better than hers. But on the whole what he gains in charm he loses in verve, and since neither represents Boccaccio photographically, the one that is the most readable—which is Miss Winwar's—seems preferable.

The format of both books is unusually attractive. That published by the Limited Editions Club seems to this reviewer slightly the handsomer if only because it is the more appropriate. The luxuriance of the Covici, Friede edition is more fin de siècle than fourteenth century. Also, the illustrations in the Covici, Friede edition, while extremely beautiful, have less in them of Boccaccio and Florence than they have of Bosschère.

The Winwar translation is prefaced with an introduction by Burton Rascoe. As is to be expected, his appreciation of Boccaccio's hundred tales is both ingenious, stimulating and well written. Unfortunately, the same praise cannot be given to his biographical paragraphs. Mr. Rascoe attributes his facts to Edward Hutton, but evidently did not read the latter any too attentively. For quite aside from one mispelled name, and an erroneous date for Petrarch's death—possibly these are misprints—he makes at least one important statement as well as several lesser ones, for which neither Hutton nor—as far as I know—any other authority affords any basis.

Inasmuch as Miss Winwar's translation is likely to become the standard English version of "The Decameron," it deserved better care than that.

A Handful of Spoofs on Contemporary Writers

THE FACTS OF LIFE. A Book of Brighter Biography Executed in the Manner of Some of Our Best or Best-Known Writers, Scriveners and Scribes. By H. W. Hanemann. Illustrated by Herb Roth. 276 pp. New York: Farrar & Rinehart. $2.50.

THIS group of ten "brighter biographies," like many smart literary ideas, is better in theory than in practice. That is not to state that "The Facts of Life" is dull or a failure. On the contrary, here is a good bit of literary burlesque. If you seek the critical felicity of a John Riddell you will be disappointed, but if you enjoy literary horseplay, interlarded with puns, to the accompaniment of illustrations of an almost Flemish vulgarity, here you have it. Taken one by one, the chapters of this book are amusing skits, written with a good sense of satire and a thorough grounding in Manhattan humor; taken in a single gulp, the effect is cloying.

Mr. Hanemann has told the story of Nell Gwynn in the manner of Kathleen Norris. We gather that life in Buckingham Palace in the days of the Merry Monarch was "just one big family"—"Babies all over the place. Isn't it wonderful?" Then we get Catherine the Great in the manner of Viña Delmar. Inspector Edgar Wallace, C. I. D., Dockets the Borgias. A rather dull travesty, "Elizabeth and Nossex" follows in the temper of "The Well of Loneliness." A rather clever, and in its way touching, account of Lord Nelson and Lady Hamilton follows in the sea-dog vein affected by Count Luckner. In "A Farewell to Josephine's Arms," Mr. Hanemann hemingways Napoleon—"a big croak and shot man from Corsica." As Josephine remarks:

> Montebello was grand. It was on Lake Como and there was lots and lots to do. We did it. We were pretty drunk most of the time.

But, then, Hemingway has been done before.

Marco Polo à la Richard Halliburton, measuring the "caverns measureless to man" and swimming "the sunless sea" of Xanadu, pokes good-natured fun at the playboy of the royal road to romance. Dr. Joseph Collins is presented as psychoanalyzing King Arthur rather effectively:

> The issue of an unsublimated inclination of King Uther Pendragon for Igraine, the amoral wife of the Duke of Tintagil, Arthur * * * suffered from juvenile fixation, inverted superiority complex, aboulia, paranoic illusions of grandeur, deficiency of genesic endowment, moral instability, adult infantilism, hormonic sixths and congenital lumbago.

Mary Roberts Rinehart supposedly gives us a glimpse of Queen Victoria's court in "Vish, Aggie and I"; while in "Oh, Ptolemy Pretty Maiden," it is shown that Cleopatra Auletes and Peggy Joyce are sisters under the skin.

Some of this is good satire. Take, for example, Charles II and Nell arguing about whether a girl should tell all:

> Charles: "If he really cared for her, he would not want her hurt, yet if it hurt him to hear what hurt her to withhold, it might be finer and better for her to nurse her hurt in silence."
> Nell: "Love is neither evasion nor concealment. Love is based on trust and trust is founded on truth. The opposite angles of an isosceles triangle are equal and two parallel lines, however prolonged, will never meet in infinity. Love is greater than the individual," &c.

And then there is murder in this thrust at the new obstetric school of fiction:

> The real matter with Catherine was that there was really nothing the matter with her. * * * Red and yellow kiddie cars and ridiculous little midget-sized furniture. It was terrifying, but it made something deep down inside of you feel like a hot fudge marshmallow sundae. Oh, she would be glad enough to have a baby. You had a baby and then you wrote a book. * * *

But the most amusing, as well as the most highly spiced, portion is that served up as Cleopatra, in the style started by Anita Loos and continued by the amanuensis of Peggy Joyce. The Serpent of Old Nile meets Pompey Junior: "Cnaesus has the loveliest arrangement with his bankers. All he has to do is sign his father's name to a check and the bank will honnor it. I think that is very Wonderful and Handy." The child Caesarion is known throughout as "Sonny Boy." That barge scene on the Cydnus is materially humanized when we read:

> I will be Aphroditte Rising from the Fumes while the other girls will be grouped about me in artistic poses. As this is Classical, none of us are to wear much clothes, and as I am Aphroditte I will wear the least. * * * Clothes are very wonderful and very necessary to make a woman look her best. Very few women look better out of their clothes than in them.

The illustrations by Herb Roth are in that versatile gentleman's usual vein. The "cosmic gesture" of Catherine the Great has the most definite quality to it; the others are, in the main, comic strip or cartoon types of pictorial humor, with a robust quality which makes them somewhat more substantial than the text.

One suspects the book's chief appeal will be to the Tribes of the Algonquin and the smarty-smarty group who know and talk about the difference between Ernest Hemingway and Richard Halliburton.

This department is designed to assist in the location of complete versions of poems and their sources, the names of authors, &c., which cannot be found through the usual channels of anthologies and books of reference. THE TIMES receives a great many more queries than it can publish. It endeavors, therefore, to select those of the greatest general interest. Queries should be addressed to the Editor of Queries and Answers, NEW YORK TIMES. They should be written on one side of the paper only, and must contain the name and address of the writer as evidence of good faith. Requests for poems that appear in these columns must be accompanied by postage.

QUERIES

"The Ancient Isle of Manhattan"

R. N. R.—Desired, the name of the author of the poem entitled, as above, the only lines of which I recall being: "When men have gone with the madness and women have gone with their tears, I'm going to come back to Broadway in just two thousand years."

"Laughter That Shook the Rafter"

W. M.—Requested, the author's name and the complete poem in which occur these lines:

Where is the laughter that shook the rafter?
Where is the rafter by the way?

"The Burial of Queen Victoria"

W. T. W.—Wanted, a poem written by an English girl on the burial of Queen Victoria. It contains the line: "For a mother in Israel has fallen asleep today."

"Darkness on the Other Side"

C. B. B.—Wish the author's name and the poem that includes these lines:

And do they passed me
Those of every race,
A maimed distorted multitude of men,
Still bleeding from the wounds
from which they died:
White as a clown chalked mask;
Each ghastly face turned over before the gate was reached
And then went down to darkness on the other side.

"Poe to the Rescue"

E. H. G.—Desired, the name of the author and the poem entitled "Poe to the Rescue." I believe it was written by Joseph Auslander.

"Old Pompion"

"Pumpkins, Morning and Noon"

M. T. R.—Requested, the author's name and the poem that contains this line: "The time where in old Pompion was a saint." Also the source of these lines:

We have pumpkins at morning and pumpkins at noon,
If it were not for pumpkins we should be undone.

M. B.—Wanted, a poem to Poe, composed in English by a native of China, now residing in our midst. If my scant information be correct, this Oriental wrote his tribute apropos of the 120th natal anniversary of Poe.

"The Struggle of a Soul"

A. W. P.—Desired, a poem descriptive of a soul's struggle, the various weapons used being named. The last, giving the victory, being laughter.

"About the Crucified Christ"

F. A. E.—Requested, the poem containing the lines: "Follow me; and He was nailed to a cross." It is a poem about the Crucified Christ.

"A Woman's Plea"

G. L.—Requested, the poem entitled "A Woman's Plea." It begins: "I thank you for your sympathy."

"The Old Year and the New"

M. M.—Wish the author's name and the poem about the New Year in which the thought is expressed that as the old year dies and a new year is born, so we should let our past sins and failures die and begin life anew. The first lines, I think, are something like this:

As the old year dies at gray December,
So let your past sins die, and remember.

"Fidelity"

C. H. M.—Desired, the name of the author and the source of the following quotation, which occurs in the Masonic Ritual: "The chief glory in the crown of manhood is fidelity, and the brightest jewel in the diadem of a monarch is fidelity.

"A Funeral Poem"

T. E. D.—Wish the name of the author and the poem, the last line of each verse ends with the words: "He has just gone upstairs and closed the door."

ANSWERS

"Like Homing Birds"

MISS NANCY LESLIE, Tazewell, Va.—In your issue of May 11 B. E. A. asked for the complete poem beginning, "Why should I write to you, my dear?" The poem is entitled "Thoughts," and the author is W. M. Letts. I enclose a copy.

THOUGHTS.

By W. M. Letts.

Why should I write to you, my
dear, why write,
When all my thoughts wing to you every night
Like homing birds? Among your poplar's leaves
Have you not heard them singing? In the eaves
Have you not seen them settling to their nest,
Content that you were near,
hushed safe and blessed?
Each sunset speeds them on their happy flight—
Why should I write?

Why should I write to you? When starlight wanes
My thoughts beat wings against your windowpanes,
And when high noon makes all your garden glow
They circle round your home on pinion slow.
A letter is a halting slave to these
Who bear my love, my hopes, my memories.
Oh, you would see them had you
keener sight—
Why should I write?

Miss Cathryn C. Magenheimer, Babylon, L. I., also sent the poem.

"His Grace, the Lord Bishop"

Miss LOUELLA D. EVERETT, Boston, Mass.—The lines given by E. D. C. (May 18) are a variant of verses used in a game called "Capping Verses," popular half a century ago, four of the verses printed in The Boston Transcript being as follows:

Why skip ye so, ye little hills,
And wherefore do ye hop?
Is it because ye do expect
To see the Lord Bish-op?

Why hop ye so, ye little hills,
And wherefore do ye skip?
Is it because ye do expect
To see the Lord Bish-ip?

Why hop ye so, ye little hills,
And why do ye jump up?
Is it because ye long to see
His Grace, the Lord Bish-up?

Why jump ye so, ye little hills,
And wherefore do ye leap?
Is it because ye eager are
To see the Lord Bish-eep?

The Scriptural allusion is to be found in Psalms vi, 16, "Why leap ye, ye high hills?"

"God Is Love"

Miss E. E. Taylor, Albany, N. Y.—In your issue of May 18, P. L. P. asked for the poem which ends with the words: "For you have God and God is Love." It would seem as if the lines are misquoted and that your subscriber has reference to the poem "The Sacrament of Love," by John Oxenham, of which I enclose a copy. The poem is published by The Pilgrim Press, Boston and Chicago, in a little booklet (price 10 cents), entitled "The Sacraments of Fire, Water, Light, Food, Work, Sleep, Pain, Life and Love." The poem is too long to publish. It begins: "Love is the sacrament of sacraments; for God is Love and Love is God, who loves knows Him, and in Him all the Heights," &c.

Katherine C. Farnan, Albany, N. Y., sent the poem "God Is Love," author unknown. It contains four stanzas and each ends with the refrain, "God Is Love."

"Lost Behind the Ranges"

THOMAS B. SCOTT, Richmond, Va.—In reply to B. B., in your issue of May 18, the lines, "Something lost behind the ranges. Lost and waiting for you. Go!" may be found in Kipling's poem "The Explorer," in the second stanza.

Mrs. Horace G. Carrell, Pelham, N. Y.; Miss Mary E. Burt, Fall River, Mass.; Edward M. Adams, Hamburg, N. Y.; A. M. Blanchard, Pawtucket, R. I.; Miss Louella D. Everett, Boston; Henry Gaines Hawn, N. Y.; Odell D. Tompkins, Mount Vernon, N. Y.; L. H. Chandler, secretary of the Kipling Society, Washington, D. C.; Miss Catherine E. Burke, Williamsburg, Mass.; Mrs. Kelly Graham, Short Hills, N. J.; Mrs I. T. Avery, Morgantown, N. C., answered this request. These correspondents sent the information that the poem is included in Kipling's "The Five Nations" as well as in his "Collected Verse" and "Inclusive Edition," and in Robert Frothingham's "Songs of Adventure."

"Daniel O'Connor"

W. S. TOMPKIN, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.—In reply to R. W. R., in your issue of May 18, for Wendell Phillips's lecture on Daniel O'Connell, it is in "Wendell Phillips: The Agitator," by Carlos Martyn, published by Funk & Wagnalls Company. It is in the appendix.

Miss Mary E. Burt, Fall River, Mass., answered this appeal.

The Fateful Year That Made Us an Industrial Nation

Professor Beale Describes in Interesting Detail the Crisis That Came in 1866

THE CRITICAL YEAR. A Study of Andrew Johnson and Reconstruction. By Howard K. Beale. 454 pp. New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co. $3.75.

By CHARLES WILLIS THOMPSON

THE year 1866 determined the future of the United States. From the blind and irrevocable decision at the polls against President Johnson dates the new industrialism, the reign of capitalism as we know it, the long domination by the financial interests North and East, the contest, now grown acute, between the East and the South and West. We are what we are because of 1866.

This is the thesis of Professor Beale of Bowdoin College, maintained with great strength in a crisp and lucid style, and fortified by as astonishing an army of authorities as ever was gathered together. His research is prodigious, and his authorities are chiefly unpublished manuscripts, letter-books, and so on. When he does have to rely on some book, he does so with evident reluctance. He has been at the primal sources, and he is able to disregard utterly the mythlike and semi-traditional history that has been the American credo from 1866 to 1929. He is dispassionately juridical in disposing of the whole group of fashionable historians, most particularly James Ford Rhodes.

The decision of 1866 was not limited to the economic conquest; it also created another factor in our life, and in part—not wholly, thanks to Johnson—still another. It brought about the secondary civil war between North and South which is politely dignified under the disguising epithet of "reconstruction," installed the first and only American Reign of Terror, and caused that cleft between the two sections which lasted until the World War, if indeed it is quite closed even yet. Until then the spirit of North and South was that of forgetting the Civil War hatreds and beginning anew.

Johnson's indomitable firmness, which was to be called his pigheaded obstinacy for sixty years—but vision has been clearing since such oculists as Winston, Stryker and Bowers took the case—prevented the full success of the third element in the program of the revolutionists. They intended a fundamental change in our three-branched government, by which Congress would have become supreme, with the President reduced to a figurehead and the Supreme Court to an appendix. It would have been, not the government set up in the Constitution, but a parliamentary despotism, ruled by a party majority of Congress; such a government as the Convention maintained in the French Revolution. The onset was so furious, and the victory at the polls so efficient, that they did seriously jar our old constitutional system and broke it here and there; but the chief remaining fragment of their success in this is their impairment of the position of the States in our Federal system.

It was, Professor Beale demonstrates, the victory of a minority, won on false pretenses. The Radicals—spelled with a capital R and meaning something at polar distance from the radicalism of 1930—were a minority among the several factions in the then conglomerate Republican party, and always had been. In 1865 the people were against them and with Johnson. By November, 1866, they had so manoeuvred as to win an electoral victory which gave them full swing in Congress, though it was won not, as the historians have hitherto believed, on the issues. It was won by a confusing of the issues which gained for them the votes at the polls of Johnson men as well as anti-Johnson men; and, once in the saddle, they used their power as ruthlessly as revolutionists always do. The delayed subsidence saw the systems they had established too firmly rooted ever to be torn up.

"Congress Overthrown! Radicals Beheaded!! Long Live King Andy!!!"

From Harper's Weekly, Nov. 3, 1866.

Before the Civil War the Atlantic States had been in a minority in the seat of power. When the Southern Senators departed from Washington in 1861 to join the Confederacy the home of industrialism had a temporary majority and used it instantly. The South and West had imposed on it a revenue tariff; the East promptly changed that to one of high and ever higher protection, and the "war tariff," as it was called, became and remains an integral part of our system. So with banking and other economic factors; everywhere the new industrialism conquered—only temporarily, everybody then supposed.

The war ended, and if the South had been allowed to return to Congress this overturn would have been temporary indeed. If the South could be kept out long enough, the new industrial order could be intrenched; and the South was kept out for over ten years longer, and the system fastened on us. The difficulty was with the people; they wanted the South readmitted. To overcome this obstacle the Radicals conducted an ingenious campaign to befog the issues, mislead the voters, and obtain what appeared to be, but was not, a majority merely against Johnson's plan of reconstruction. They made the voters believe that if the Fourteenth Amendment were adopted they would immediately restore the South to Washington. Once safely in power they not only broke that word of promise to the hope, but went further: divided the South into provinces instead of States and ruled each province by bayonet, with a General directing the soldiers in each.

This conquest was won not simply by false appeals but by the most audacious skullduggery, by dirty work. An instance was the breaking up by hired mobs of Johnson's swing around the circle, followed by the assurance through the press—which the Radicals controlled, largely by government advertising, which was the breath of life in those far-off days—that Johnson himself was responsible through his drunken conduct of the "swing."

This is not history as it has been writ; but Professor Beale is little affected by the evidence on which other historians have relied, the stump speeches and newspaper editorials, which were part of the campaign of deception. As has been already said, he digs deeper and goes to the obscure but certain sources.

That the revolutionists conquered was not due alone to their Machiavellian ingenuity but to the mistakes of the other side. Though Johnson was utterly opposed to the new economics, he refused to make an issue of it—if he had, he could have split the Radicals wide open—on the ground that nothing should be done until the South was readmitted. The great blunder, though, according to Professor Beale, was the failure to create a new party of tolerant Northerners and submissive Southerners at a time which was ripe for it.

The opportunity was glaring. It came when the "Arm-in-Arm Convention" was held at Philadelphia, when both North and South wanted peace, and when delegates from Massachusetts and South Carolina marched, arm locked in arm, into the convention hall. We are so accustomed to the division between Democrats and Republicans that it is hard to visualize a time when both parties were in chaos. The Republicans did not even call themselves by that name, they were the "Union party," which was made up of old-time Republicans and war Democrats; and the original Republicans themselves were split between Moderates—the majority—and Radicals, the minority. The Democrats were split between war and peace men, and, as Professor Beale says, "the four vertical political groups were now horizontally cross-sectioned" on economic and constitutional lines as well as on the mere questions of reconstruction and Negro suffrage. There was neither a real Republican nor a real Democratic party.

"Johnson Befriends the Negro."

From Harper's Weekly, Sept. 1, 1866.

The Arm-in-Arm Convention appeared to be a great success. If the delegates had gone home and organized a party of moderates, as Johnson hoped, they had the country with them. But the Democrats among them saw a mirage of slipping into power as the old party; and the Republicans wanted to work through their own party organization. Alas, the machine was in the hands of the Radical minority, which nominated the candidates, as did the old Democratic machine; and the result was that at the polls the voter had to choose between a Radical candidate and a Copperhead. Even a Johnson man preferred the Radical in such a case.

At that, the Radicals could never have won on a straight issue, but in the East they were redhot for the new economic system and in the West they soft-pedaled it. In New England they were for Negro suffrage; in the West they "definitely disclaimed it," says Professor Beale. Everything was misrepresented, and nearly all avenues of information were closed to the voters. They voted the Radical ticket because they were against Negro suffrage and because they were for it, and so on. Yet the historians represent that verdict as clear against Johnson and moderation and for oppression of the South, and have nothing to say about the economic situation back of it all. The victory, however, enabled the revolutionists to claim a popular endorsement, and they kept the saddle until, in 1877, President Hayes came in, ousted the soldiers from the South and undid their work—as far as he was able. By that time the new industrialism was a part of our system and the gulf between North and South—which had been closing after Appomattox and Grant's generous terms—had become what Horace Greeley called, in 1872, "the bloody chasm."

The only part of the program that failed was the section for a remodeling of our form of government, so that Congress would be the sole ruler, and the abolition of the States as a governmental factor. There is something prophetic in the arguments of the moderates against it. In words that created a great stir at the time, Henry Ward Beecher, one of them, said:

> The Federal Government is unfit to exercise minor police and local government, and will inevitably blunder when it attempts it. * * * However humane the ends sought and the motive, it is, in fact, a course of instruction preparing our government to be despotic and familiarizing the people to a stretch of authority which can never be other than dangerous to liberty.

In 1930 Beecher's words sound as if he had been gifted with second sight. Even in this the Radicals, whose power after 1866 was absolute, would have succeeded but for the rock in the White House, Andrew Johnson. It is little wonder that they vainly tried to remove him by impeachment.

Their victory was not won on the issues, but by masterly campaign management, claptrap about the danger of "rebel" rule, and vituperation. It was necessary to arouse hatred against Johnson, and he was replaced in the imagination by a figure as unlike him as day from night; a woman-chaser, a vulgar drunkard, the instigator of Lincoln's assassination, the plotter of a coup d'état. Nothing approaching it was ever seen in American history until Alfred E. Smith ran for the Presidency, though many a candidate has been very severely distorted.

As for vituperation, it reached and passed the limit. Thaddeus Stevens, for instance, the Radical leader in the House, reminded his hearers how the Lord sent plagues to Egypt including frogs, locusts, murrain and lice, and added, "He has sent us more than lice, and afflicted us with Andrew Johnson."

Four Centuries of Mrs. Grundy

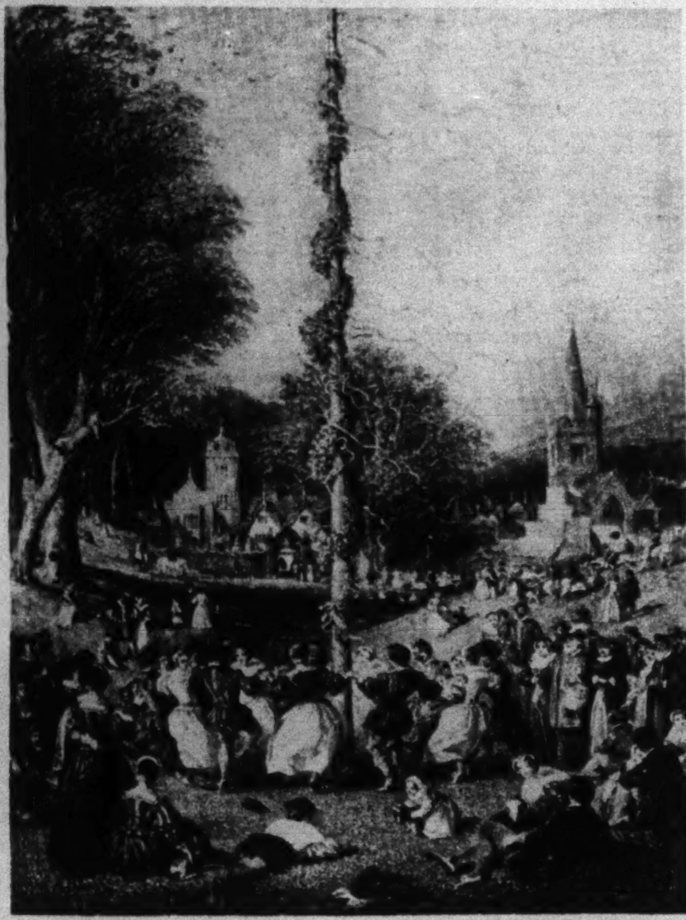
Mr. Markun Writes a Comprehensive History of Community Regulation of Behavior in Great Britain and America

MRS. GRUNDY. A History of Four Centuries of Morals Intended to Illuminate Present Problems in Great Britain and the United States. By Leo Markun. Illustrated. 666 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $5.

By ARTHUR KROCK

EVERYBODY in every age, as small boys whose studies have taken them as far as Cicero's orations know, has discussed the state of public morality. Unlike the weather, everybody is always trying to do something about it. Kings and Bishops have attempted it. Councils and Legislatures have passed laws and meted out punishments. In this country, more than in any other, unofficial volunteers have wrestled mightily with public tastes and standards. Still the issue turns on the point of authority. Who shall say where the exact moral line crosses the field of human conduct and thought? "When Mrs. Grundy," says her biographer, Mr. Markun, "was an ancient Spartan, she insisted that free-born boys should be taught to steal, for she knew their courage and self-reliance would otherwise be imperiled." The lady's viewpoint changes according to the place and time. There is no single rule which has always prevailed everywhere, or which—among the respectable—prevails everywhere now.

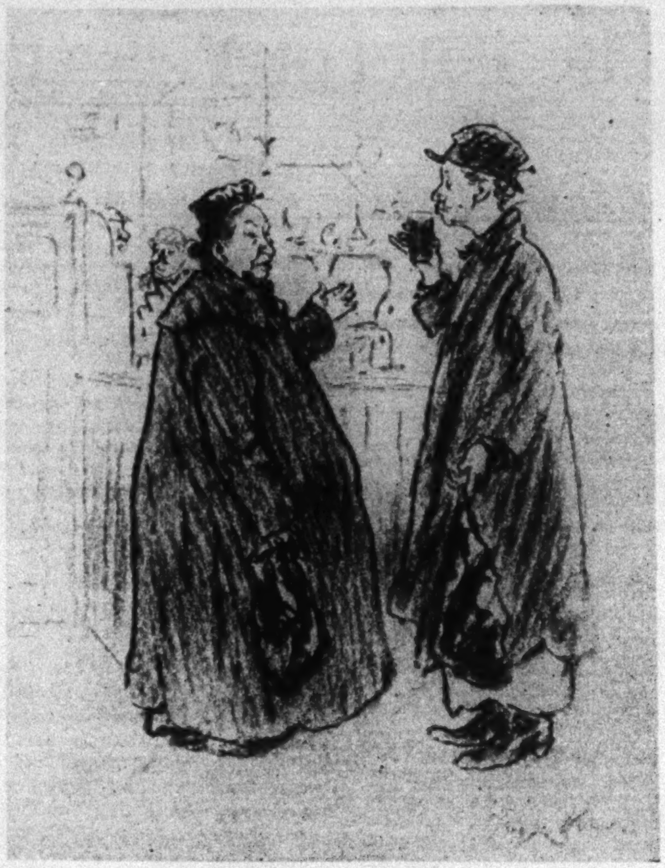
Such is Mr. Markun's thesis in his thick, heavily-documented narrative. For the plain inference he argues but lightly. He is content for the most part to be a historian. Often in this absorbing tale of the struggle of human beings to regulate the lives of other human beings in the English-speaking countries, it is possible to discern a well-bred smile on the face of the chronicler. But he never laughs out loud; he does not labor any point. His feeling is apparently that any one who will trouble to read, or even skim through, this remarkable collation of the history of prurience will draw an inevitable conclusion. Which is, of course, that one in authority must do the best he can according to the standards of his race and time, seeking to keep them tolerant and sensible, not striving to move his fellow-beings too swiftly along the path which seems to him to lead to purity of life. Prohibitionists; anti-tobacco crusaders; the hounds of heaven who are constantly on literature's traces; protagonists of the sternest sexual codes—all these may read with interest and profit in the experiences of humanity with their kind for 400 years. If they are not impressed, Mr. Markun shrugs his shoulders. He has done all he can coldly to illuminate the plain of social controversy. Scorning exhortation and precept, he chooses to teach by example. Whatever else he may convey to the officious, he has made an interesting and entertaining book for them and for others.



The May Pole. After a Painting by J. Nash.

"Mrs. Grundy" is issued at a fitting time. Throughout the uneasy American mass there are to be descried those stirrings which, among the nations whose language is English, usually fortell a breaking of legal bonds. In the same moment of political unrest social appearances turn more formal. "The casual observer sees fewer feminine knees than he did a few years ago," but the Honorable Dwight Whitney Morrow comes out for repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment. Radio responsibles seriously discuss when in non-religious broadcasting the words "damn" or "hell" should be used; but Massachusetts is struggling to liberalize its book laws. Into this melting lava of thought Mr. Markun tosses his serene brand. To be smothered, or to set new fires? The author does not seem to care very much. This is the ideal attitude of the historian.

Our ancestors, as we all know, have worried themselves immemorially over the same points of conduct which perplex this age. Each time they have gone too far in regulation, the propulsion of reaction has thrown humanity farther on the liberal side. This has in turn been succeeded by rigid reform; looseness has supplanted it; and so ad infinitum. It is not yet known, and no mathematician has attempted to compute, how often mankind must learn this lesson before changes will be sought slowly, no faster indeed than overwhelming public opinion goes along with it. Turning the pages of Mr. Markun's monumental work, one would assume that the time of common-sense regulation was at hand. One would assume it, that is, until he notes how often experience seemed to have taught the lesson before.



The Economics of Prohibition.

Charlady: "Prohibition May Be All Right in America, Mrs. 'arris, but It Won't Catch On Over 'ere. It's Too Expensive."

From a Cartoon by George Belcher.

In Calvin's Geneva, before "the man sent from God" had gotten in his best licks, clothing was suggestive; guests at parties flung dirt at one another in sport; and preachers used foul language. Savonarola, Luther and Swingli planted the seed for Calvin's reaping, and rigid exactions followed. A girl was put to death for striking her mother. A man who swore by Christ was put in the pillory. Another was imprisoned for calling his son by the name of a Catholic saint. All dancing was forbidden; the law even prescribed the number of wedding guests and the courses which might be served. Eagerly was this welcomed by "Mrs. MacGrundy of Scotland." The Presbytery of Aberdeen ordered the head of every house to keep a rod for use on his wife, his children and his servants. Swearing was considered popery. Singing on New Year's Day was a sin, and the celebration of Christmas was forbidden save by fast and prayer. But though the Scots went very far, they did not scotch the bottle.

Elizabeth "petted young squires * * * and was wont to boast that she could kick higher when she danced than her cousin, Mary Stuart." When displeased, she spat at the offender. The drama was smutty; so was much of the poetry. But women were not permitted to act in the theatres. Bear-baiting flourished, and piracy was rewarded; but ethical precepts and chivalry were highly regarded; and piety was mandatory. Out of this rose Puritanism. Yet Cromwell "liked music, was fond of horses, enjoyed hunting and hawking and sometimes played at bowls." The Pilgrims departed from the illogical scene to found a colony where their more exact ideas could have full scope. They made the Lord's Day a terror to the young. Those who stayed away from meeting were arrested and flogged. A child might not say on the Lord's Day that it had seen a squirrel run across the road. Some ministers refused to baptize infants born on Sunday, the presumption being that perhaps on that day they were conceived. The president of Harvard in 1673 said that he looked upon "toleration as the first-born of all abominations." But meanwhile "at home" Charles II had come to his throne and had been followed by his Catholic brother. The social pendulum was stuck in the upper right-hand corner. Virginia and Maryland emigrants reflected more this line of conduct than did any others, but in these colonies, too, there were harsh proscriptions.

The taboos are with us still. The looseness, now publicly revealed, was always present. Syndics and selectmen frequently drove it into the background; that was all. Taste and general morals may be getting better; Mr. Markun is too punctilious a historian to utter a strong opinion. But Mrs. Grundy is a whimsical person, swift to change, a born mugwump, as hot now as one side as then on the other. Such is what he seeks to prove, and it is distinctly what he does prove. The Victorian Age had its shady side but kept it undermost. The Georgian Age kept it topside. What of our age? Mr. Markun presents the facts; let the reader judge. All we can be sure of is that regulation is ever inconsistent. The nation which voted for and supports prohibition views tenderly and liberally Mr. Connolly's dramatization of the God of the cornfield Negro on the stage. He would have been hanged for it in old Massachusetts and probably by Charles II as well. "Lysistrata" plays to capacity audiences in Philadelphia, metropolis of the Quaker colony. Even in his sporting days at the court of James II the Founder would have turned his eyes from the wise merriment of Aristophanes.

No, the story of Mrs. Grundy is too entangled for any of us to draw confident conclusions. Like Mr. Markun, who compiles it, we had best refrain from being positive about the rights and wrongs. Emerging from his curious list of regulatory facts he could not well be otherwise. He has examined Calvin's Geneva; John Knox's Scotland; the England of the Tudors and the Stuarts, of Cromwell and Anne and the Georges, of Victoria and her male descendants. He has studied The Chosen People of New England; the Southern colonists; the Free Thinkers who founded the Republic; the reformers, from Roger Williams to Bishop Cannon; the Age of Innocence after the War of States; the prudes of Pre-war and the wild women of Post-war days. There may come a race and time—wise, serene and tolerant, its appetites harnessed like its rivers—which will find this book as curious as The Golden Bough. Let us hope so.

FIVE NATIONAL VIEWS OF THE LONDON NAVAL TREATY

DAVID JAYNE HILL, American Diplomat, explains the United States reception of the London naval pact as being dependent on the necessity for parity with Great Britain.

H. WICKHAM STEED, British Editor, tells of the relief, rather than the satisfaction, with which Great Britain welcomed the conclusion of the conference.

J. DOCTEUR, French Admiral, justifies the French stand at the conference by saying that she could not reduce her armaments without guarantees of security.

CARLO SCHANZER, Italian Senator, puts the blame for the failure of the conference to achieve a five-power pact largely on the French demand for naval armaments superior to those of Italy.

K. K. KAWAKAMI, Japanese Publicist, depicts Japanese opinion as neither entirely satisfied nor entirely dissatisfied with the treaty.

New Pages of Amiel's Diary Reveal a Tale of Love

His Romantic Attachment to Philine Throws New Light On the Swiss Writer's Life

PHILINE. From the Unpublished Journals of Henri-Frederic Amiel. Translated by Van Wyck Brooks. With an Introduction by Edmond Jaloux. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $3.

By T. R. YBARRA.

THIS is an attempt to give a thread of unity to that remarkable example of self-revelation, the journal of Amiel. For some thirty years, a goodly portion of his life, this introspective Swiss savant, who labored faithfully as a professor and rose to be director of the Conservatory at Geneva, kept, day by day, the record of his doings and thoughts which was destined, after his death, to bring him the fame which had eluded him all his life. Day by day he confided to his notebooks beliefs and doubts, resolutions and vacillations, unsparing analysis of his faults, estimates of friends and foes—also the history of the love affair that constituted the most important chapter in the history of his heart. When he died, the record thus painstakingly kept across a period of three decades filled many volumes. Those who inventoried Amiel's belongings found that the journals which were to bring him posthumous celebrity ran to a total of well-nigh 17,000 written pages.

In them are gems of philosophy, acute reasonings about human affairs, profound reflections about women, revelations of a man's mind and a man's heart which, in devastating frankness, have few equals. Yet Amiel's journals, despite their superlative worth, have not been published as a whole—they are too voluminous. The world has learned about the soul-searchings of this doubting Thomas of Geneva, of this "man with a sick will," through the labors of a number of literati who have delved into his 17,000 pages of manuscript and made public copious excerpts from them. In 1883, not long after Amiel's death, a selection from his journals entitled "Unfinished Fragments" appeared. It was the foundation of his posthumous fame. Shortly afterward Paul Bourget produced a masterly study of Amiel's work and contributed greatly to the lustre already shed upon the Swiss professor's name by the first excerpts from his life-record

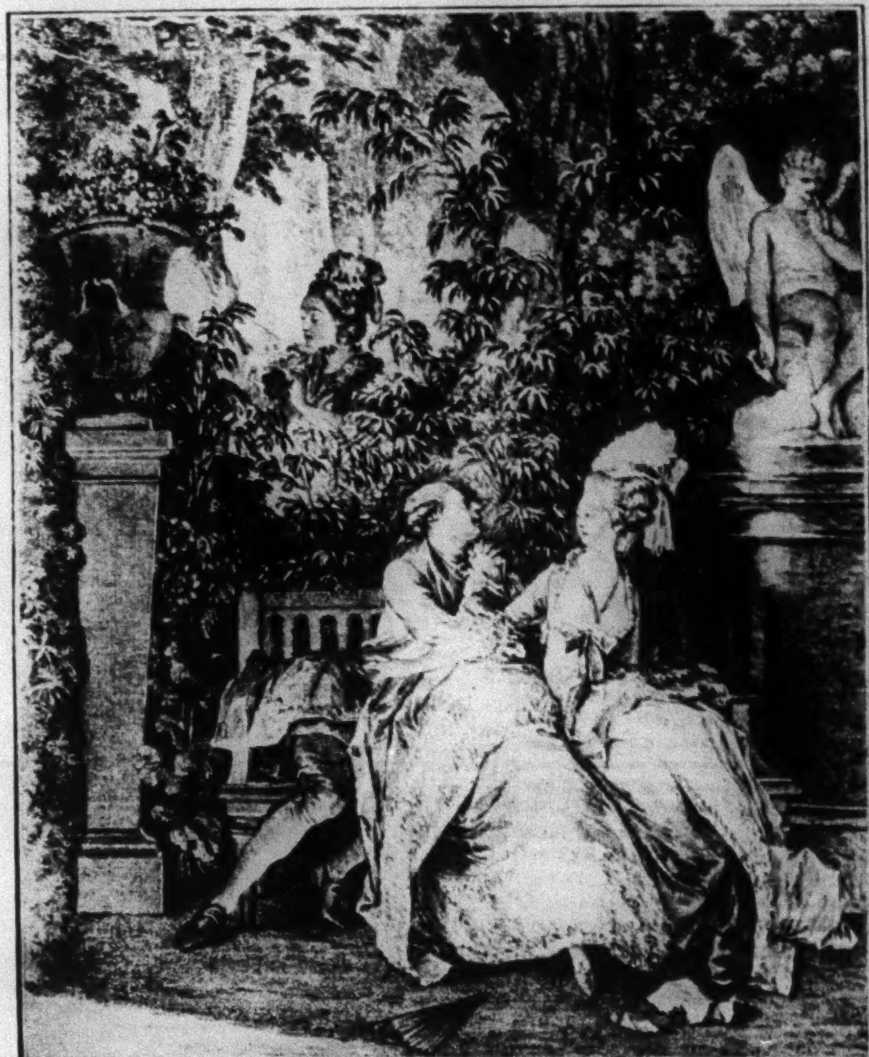
In the case of the volume now before us we have again a series of excerpts from Amiel's journals, but they are not excerpts chosen at random. They are mutually interdependent; all have a bearing on one of the most vitally important phases of Amiel's life—the love affair, so minutely chronicled by him, with the young woman whom he called "Philine." In choosing the story of Philine and Amiel as the thread on which to string their selections from the journals, those responsible for this volume—M. Bernard Bouvier and M. Edmond Jaloux—have hit upon a happy expedient to give unity to their work. For "Philine" occupied Amiel's thoughts for years, caused him to abandon his jealously preserved celibacy, almost moved him to venture upon matrimony, shook some of his most cherished beliefs, struck from him some of his best flashes of philosophy. Moreover, M. Bouvier and M. Jaloux—to whom the journals in their entirety were entrusted by those into whose hands they came at Amiel's death—have not been content merely to amass a succession of passages in which "Philine" is mentioned. Instead, they have sought to blend such passages with others naturally leading up to them or emanating from them. Only in this way did it seem to the two collaborators that they could give a complete picture of Amiel the man and Amiel the thinker.

It is indeed a full-length portrait of Amiel which this method has given us; or rather, of Amiel's mind, for it would be well-nigh impossible to paint a satisfying portrait of one who so resolutely subordinated body to soul, action to thought. One sometimes wonders whether Amiel really had a body, whether he really talked and walked and ate and drank. In him the thinking being seems so detached from the acting being that one is half-inclined to believe that his thoughts took shape in words without aid from tongue or lips; that locomotion, in him, was something derived direct from brain power without the cooperation of anything so vulgar as legs; that his food was brain-ambrosia and his drink mind-nectar.

Something of this sort must have occurred to the young woman called Philine. She loved Amiel wholeheartedly; he loved her as much as he could. She broke down the first line of his defenses, penetrated further into his reality than any other woman, came within an ace of forcing him to strike the flag of his aloofness flying proudly over the citadel of his sacred inner self.

But—Amiel never hauled down that flag. Fighting from behind his last ramparts, with his pet convictions lying, dead or dying, around him, he suddenly nerved his intellect to a last desperate charge, placed Amiel the Thinker in command of a forlorn hope against Amiel the Man, and—the Thinker won.

A minimum of action with a maximum of philosophizing on the lack of it—that sums up Amiel's love affair with Philine. Yet, after all, it also sums up Amiel's journals and Amiel himself—and the very fact that he persisted, in his journals, in pouring out that maximum of philosophical reflection on his ineffectual nature is the reason why the name of Henri-Frédéric Amiel bids fair to become immortal. Another would have condoned and palliated and excused—nay, most would have exonerated himself at every step, suppressing what was weak in his actions, touching up what was meritorious, probably deliberately falsifying that which he was presenting as a truthful X-ray photograph of the workings of his mind.



"Oui Ou Non?"

Amiel scorned to do that. Struggling against his intellectual aloofness on the one hand and his love for Philine on the other, he felt himself cowardly, and—with a courage entirely at variance with his faltering before the necessity to act—he subjects himself, in his Journals, to pitiless vivisection. Once he exclaims:

> The hour arrived to be amiable, grateful, touched; I have been flat, cold, prosaic and stupid enough to eat hay. Is this not enough to disgust one with oneself? The mysterious unknown seemed to me charming through her veil; she had all the calm and assurance that I lacked . . . The dread of ridicule, the fear of doing wrong, the horror of decisive action, the agonies of the imagination, which destroys the real through the image of the possible, everything combines to deprive me of the strength demanded in the present instance. My claws are clipped, my fangs filed off, my mane shorn—the lion is only a bow-wow.

And later:

> I am too much man and not enough the individual. Is this the result of philosophy? Is it due to an aptitude for generality, the species, the type, the theory and contrary to a practical disposition? Perhaps. Moreover, to know satisfies me, perhaps, even better than to possess, to enjoy, to act. My strongest taste is for watching, understanding, contemplating. And the theory needs to be universal, panoramic, spherical; it refuses to be shut up in a special case. It is life that I wish to experience rather than my life.

True to his belief that he was more a type than an individual, Amiel is prone, in his journals, to indulge in generalizations, many of which have been included in the chronicle of his love for Philine. This is as it should be. They show admirably Amiel's tendency to fly from all that is specific, from life in particular to life in general, from Philine to the whole female sex.

While she—doubtless—was eating her heart out because she could not win his entire love, he was burning the midnight oil writing:

> Woman is certainly our angel and our demon, the best and the worst of this base world, that which gives us life and death, happiness and despair. From her comes peace and trouble, virtue and vice, ecstacy and remorse, hell and heaven for man on this earth. She is the Temptation, the Enigma, the Abyss, the Curse, and the Blessing, because she is unknown and because she determines our fate. Capable of everything, source of everything, mother of everything, her breast is like Pandora's box, it conceals all sorrows and all human joys. * * * We cannot exist either without or with her; she is our anxiety, our desire, our fear, our support, our terror, our anger and our love. We are besotted without her, her kiss inflames us, her embrace unnerves us. The safest thing is to flee her in youth and marry her at a ripe age, for otherwise she devours and consumes us, instead of soothing and strengthening us.

"My sense of honor seems to have passed into my head!" Amiel confided to his journal one day. And again: "The critical passion has consumed all the other instincts." And again, fighting his desire to give himself unreservedly to love: "Reason alone is always right, and the inner freedom consists in returning to reason."

> Why is it [he continues] that no woman holds me? Because many charm me. It is easier to love them all than to consecrate one's self to a single one. Beauty, grace, kindness, wit, passion, sweetness and enthusiasm impress me, captivate me and enchant me in turn. Everything attracts me; nothing holds me. To hold me, one would have to be constantly renovated and transformed according to my taste. In order to replace all other women for me, a woman would have to be as changeable as water and as perfect as light.

Amiel never married Philine. He never married any woman. And Philine, giving up the fight with a noble gesture, as if she were the plenipotentiary of her sex and he the incarnation of all doubters, made an orderly retreat to the friendship with Amiel which had preceded their love affair.

That is the picture conjured up by the expertly chosen, neatly dovetailed selections from Amiel's journals now presented to us. The two French collaborators — ably seconded, as translator, by Mr. Brooks—make us see, as if they stood before our eyes, Philine, first of all a woman, and Amiel, last of all a man. We are made to resent, many times, that Philine's side of the matter is presented mostly in Amiels' words; that, even though there are many quotations from her love letters, we are getting what is distinctly biased testimony.

How interesting it would be to hear her version of the affair, without omission or abbreviation! It would be like listening to a flame's voluble explanation of why it had not melted a bar of iron!

The Dictionary of American Biography

DICTIONARY OF AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY. Volume III, Brearly to Chandler. Volume IV, Chanfrau to Cushing. Index, Volumes I-IV. Edited by Allen Johnson and Dumas Malone. Published under the auspices of the American Council of Learned Societies. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. (Priced at $250 for the set of 20 volumes).

THE editors have now completed the first four volumes of the Dictionary of American Biography, and have provided, in a separate volume, a comprehensive index to this published portion of their work. The third and fourth volumes, here noticed, brings us almost to the end of the entries under C. The work continues to show admirable proportion in the amount of space allotted to the various subjects. There is only one notable omission from the lives included in these two volumes, and that is the absence of any sketch dealing with Stephen Burroughs, that notorious rogue of Colonial New England, whose autobiography is one of the most entertaining of records in the literature of self-revelation. The omission is the more surprising in view of the catholic attitude which the editors have adopted in their standards of eligibility.

The volumes now ready include 2,758 names. The Index offers some interesting statistics regarding their geographical distribution, for the subjects are listed by birthplaces, as well as by colleges (if any), in addition to the alphabetical list of subjects, and of contributors with subjects. The distribution of birthplaces, it is noted in the Introduction, > brings home to us in a surprising manner how recent and how rapid has been the settlement of great stretches of our country. For instance, of these 2,758 persons, 168 were born in Connecticut; only three were born in California; 149 were born in Virginia and only one was born in Kansas. The explanation, of course, lies in the fact that the first men to do things of importance in the Western States were necessarily born in the East, and the native sons of the Western States have not yet—by dying—become eligible for inclusion in the Dictionary.

The classification by occupations provides figures which are no less interesting. First place is taken by the clergymen, who lead with 306 names. Authors rank second with a showing of 287 names. There are 194 lawyers and 179 educators. Physicians number 89, and there are 82 editors. Manufacturers are represented to the number of 80, and there are 79 merchants. Inventors number 73 (a high figure which goes to support the idea of ingenuity as a national characteristic). There are 72 painters, 60 engineers and 50 diplomats. Thirteen composers are included, and 44 actors and actresses. Among the occupations which appear but once are those of dancer (Vernon Castle), alienist (William Maclay Awl), anaesthetist (Garner Quincy Colton), bacteriologist (James Carroll), climatologist (Lorin Blodget), clockmaker (Hiram Camp), Confederate spy (Belle Boyd), hotel man (George C. Boldt), meat packer (Michael Cudahy), Mississippi pilot (Horace Ezra Bixby), spiritualist (Luther Colby) and taxidermist (Carl Akeley).

"I had to OWN The ART OF THINKING"

By Abbé Ernest Dimnet

MY library is small—there are so few books I want to keep—most of my reading is done through public libraries or books kindly loaned by friends. But when I read a borrowed copy of The Art of Thinking, I knew after a few pages that I must buy one for myself. ABBÉ DIMNET's sparkling little book has refreshed my mind at every reading—the perfect example of the book one must own—to keep close at hand. JOHN DEWEY well says of it: "Read a page or two, a paragraph, opening at random; read it consecutively. Keep it on a bedside table, and read it to compose your mind at night and arouse it in the morning."

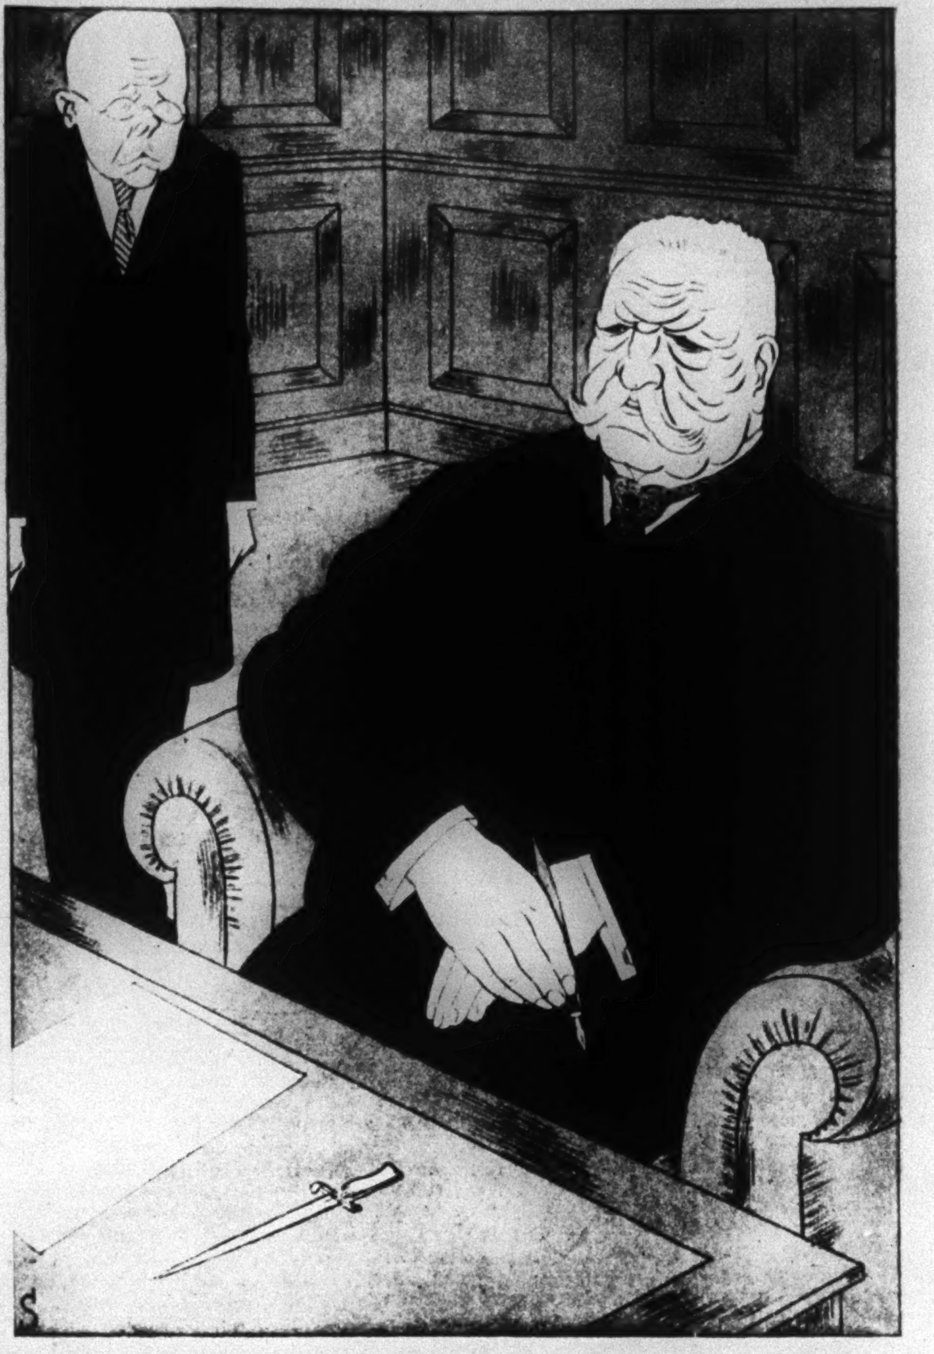
Hindenburg, Whose Life Is Ruled by Duty

Two Biographers Prepare an Interesting Study of the President of the German Republic



Von Hindneburg and Marx.

Marx: "Und Schreiben Sie, Bitte, in Mein Abgangszeugnis, Dass Ich in Lauf der Jahre Allen Richtungen Treu Gedient Habe."

From a Caricature by E. Schilling in Simplicissimus. From "Caricature of Today." (Albert & Charles Boni.)

THE BIOGRAPHY OF PRESIDENT VON HINDENBURG. By Rudolph Wetterstetten and A. M. K. Watson. 276 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

EVERY day of his life must bring fresh wonder to Paul von Hindenburg. When he retired from active service in the German Army he was well past sixty, not a book had been written about him, and there seemed every reason to believe that he would go to his grave without either becoming a hero in military life or the hero of a book. Summoned from retirement in 1914, when he was sixty-seven, and rushed to the German eastern frontier to stem the tide of Russian invasion he did the job so well that he became the most popular figure in Germany, the centre of a legend and the leading figure in a literature which sprang up, mushroom-like, in the wake of his victories.

Then came the collapse of the Central Powers. Hindenburg was flung back into private life, defeated and again, apparently, doomed to oblivion. But books continued to be published in which he played a prominent rôle; for, after all, little could be written about the great war without something about him in its pages. Moreover, like so many other Generals on both sides, Hindenburg wrote a book of memoirs.

Soon, however, there was a lull in this battle of the books. Quiet settled over the villa at Hanover where the former leader of the Kaiser's armies was living; Hindenburg seemed to have become a back number; the books that appeared in Germany and elsewhere had little or nothing to say about him.

Then, suddenly, at the age of seventy-seven, he was elected President of the German Republic.

Immediately the Hindenburg legend took on fresh life and books about him began to appear again. To the rich crop of those produced by the war and its first aftermath others were added, to satisfy the craving in and out of Germany to read about the man who had twice been snatched from retirement; who, defeated as few Generals have been defeated, while fighting for the German monarchy, was chosen as the leader of that republican Germany which has been reared on the ruins of the Germany of the Hohenzollerns.

The book now being reviewed is the latest of this third crop of Hindenburg books; it provides eloquent proof of the insatiability of the world's appetite for all appertaining to Hindenburg; of the vitality of the blend of truth and legend that has grown up around him since those Summer days of 1914 when he won the battle of Tannenberg and put an end to his dreams of a quiet old age.

Mr. Wetterstetten and Mr. Watson necessarily cover much old ground in their new Hindenburg book. After all, most of what can now be said about the "Old Man of the Lakes" has been said. The authors of this most recent of Hindenburg biographies have been content to present a Hindenburg with whom we have become increasingly familiar in the years since the armistice.

But they have done their work well. The book is thorough, compact and interesting. It is written with skill; there is a lack of striving for effect; an apparent desire to keep away from too much hero-worship and, at the same time, be fair to Hindenburg's good qualities. For those who wish to get a bird's-eye view, so to speak, of the career of the octogenarian President of the German Republic, from his earliest days as a cadet to his election to the Presidency in 1925, there could scarcely be a better book. Those who see no good in Hindenburg, who still remember that his name stands second on the list of German "war criminals," must go elsewhere than to these pages for their Hindenburgiana—likewise those who wish expert analysis of his merits and demerits, both as soldier and statesman.

The Wetterstetten-Watson book does not pretend to go deep into such analysis. And that, after all, is better than to pretend to be deep yet, in reality, be shallow, which has been the fault of many a book about the great figures of the World War.

Like other writers on Hindenburg, the pair now in question harp constantly on his devotion to duty. That, indeed, seems to them the "leit-motiv" of his whole life. They show how it influenced him in important decisions alike in youth and old age, war and peace; how, in combination with the thorough military discipline to which he had subjected himself since boyhood, it served to make possible for him the accomplishment of the three tasks which (as the two authors see it) were the supreme moments of his career.

These tasks, according to them, were the winning of the battle of Tannenberg, the supervision of the return of the German armies to Germany after their defeat in the war, and his work as President of the German Republic. Of this trio of herculean labors, they wrote:

> Other Generals, in their old age, have fought and won battles, but no other man, after four years of grueling warfare against an ever-increasing enemy, has had to conduct the return of a defeated and starving soldiery into a starving and revolutionary country. It might well have been expected that a man who had negotiated such difficulties would beg to be left to finish his days in peace and quiet; but when, in his ripe old age, another arduous duty was offered to him, the old soldier, who had never listened to any voice but that of duty, once again obeyed its call and accepted the high, difficult office of the Presidency.

Many pages of the book are devoted to Hindenburg the soldier, to Tannenberg and the battles that came after it, to Hindenburg's work on the eastern front, when he was waging gigantic battles against the Grand Duke Nicholas, and on the western front when Frenchmen, Englishmen, Belgians and Americans were pitted against him in equally stupendous struggles. Nor is Hindenburg the politician forgotten—and here he comes out less well than in his capacity as soldier. The authors tell how he detested politics and detested having to be mixed up with them.

> His skill and perspicacity [they write] in all military questions, however complicated these might be, and his patience in working out every detail with due thoroughness, were qualities which he was unable to carry into the realm of politics. And he hated diplomacy. There is evidence of asperity and of some lack of understanding in his own writings on the subject. "The ins and outs of all these political questions and counter-questions only brought me uncomfortable hours and increased my dislike of politics."

And yet Messrs. Wetterstetten and Watson go on to say that the work of Hindenburg, President of the German Republic, will doubtless overshadow in history the record of Hindenburg, leader of Germany's armies in the World War. When he was first elected it was confidently predicted both in Germany and abroad that he would merely be a tool of the monarchists, probably a stop-gap until some monarch could be hoisted onto the throne from which Wilhelm Hohenzollern had been so ignominiously tumbled.

But those who thought that way completely misjudged Hindenburg; they completely forgot the devotion to duty which had been his guiding star throughout his long life of nearly fourscore years.

Ever since his accession to the Presidency the old warrior has worked hard to hold the balance true between Germany's rival parties, to be true to the oath of fealty which he swore to the new republic when he accepted the highest office within its gift. To this renewed proof of Hindenburg's devotion to duty the authors of this new book about him do ample justice.

Yet they do not lose sight of Hindenburg's obvious limitations; there is no attempt to endow him with qualities that he does not possess, to obscure the true portrait of the man by seeking to paint him with lineaments that do not belong to him. In summing him up, they write:

> Hindenburg is not, like Bismarck, a man of ideas. Bismarck had the power not only to evolve ideas but to put them into execution. He was the first to make a united Germany possible; he alone created the empire. Fate then overthrew his work and plunged it into hopeless ruin—and there was no new Bismarck found in Germany to restore it. It must never be forgotten that Bismarck was the first to unite these States, or what a herculean task the forming of that union was. But the work that he did was, nevertheless, not stable—and we venture to think that the work of Hindenburg will have more lasting results.
> The idea upon which he is working is still, broadly speaking, the idea of Bismarck, but the method is far different. * * * He has sacrificed his own soul for the sake of the country; in his old age he has come forward and by the light of a personal example he has led his people through some of the darkest and most difficult years that any country has ever been called upon to endure. * * * Above the tumult and fret of everyday life, above the actions and counter-actions of the parties, stands the President. He alone sounds the note of hope and encouragement, he alone keeps the whole country in a certain measure united.

The book leans much on Hindenburg's own memoirs—"Aus Meinem Leben"—which he wrote shortly after the German collapse. But it supplies an objectivity which even the most modest of autobiographers cannot attain. Readers of this book will have, when they finish it, as good a portrait of Germany's soldier-statesman as we can expect to have painted for us in this generation. If there is to be a reappraisal of Hindenburg, it must come at a later day.

Park Avenue—A Story of Evolution

THE ROMANCE OF PARK AVENUE. By F. A. Collins. Illustrated. 107 pp. New York: The Park Avenue Association. $2.50.

MR. COLLINS has chosen a true word for his title, for the story of Park Avenue is indeed one of romance in which the street passes through startling changes, from wood nymph to country maid, from grimy Cinderella to stately dame of fashion. He tells it all comprehensively and with as much detail as records make it possible now to get together, beginning with the earliest Dutch settlers three centuries ago, one of whom named his home "Zegendal"—the Vale of Blessing. A few years later, in the middle of the seventeenth century, the Park Avenue region began its social annals with the wedding of Jacob Kipp and the daughter of Dr. James de la Montagne, while the scene of the first fancy dress ball in this country, Mr. Collins tells us, was the famous Murray mansion, directly in the path of the present Park Avenue between Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Streets, although its time was a century later. The author describes the development of all this section before and after the War of the Revolution as a region of beautiful country estates, of woodlands and highly cultivated farms, of lovely gardens and fine, hospitable mansions wherein were entertained all the famous folk who visited this country. It was half a day's journey from the little city down at the end of the island.

Carrying the story on, Mr. Collins tells about the gradual advance of more urban conditions, leading to the building along the line of what is now Park Avenue of the first street railway in the world, in 1832. He devotes much attention to this work, recounting all the important developments, making many quotations from the newspapers of the time, going on to the digging of the Murray Hill tunnel and other developments, and warmly commending the "surprising vision of a group of engineers," without whose faith and energy and ability "the beautiful sweep of lower Park Avenue might never have been realized." The region as the abode of great numbers of squatters takes the author's attention, and from this he passes on to the modern growth of the avenue to its present spacious and stately appearance. The story of Park Avenue is colorful and dramatic and Mr. Collins has vigilantly got together much interesting material.

world-peace—and he has been recognized as everything but that." Miss Jennings admits the extent to which Shakespeare made use of the noise and pageantry, the blood and death of war, but she insists that "he unleashed the dogs of war, and then showed the futility of war." "There is," she says, "a large body of cumulative testimony throughout his works implicity, and often explicitly, expressed which unmistakably repudiates 'the savage spirit of wild war.'" And she marshals very effectively this body of "cumulative testimony," drawing it from nearly all the plays and discussing it and its significance with no little eloquence, but also with good sense and sound logic. Miss Jennings's thesis is an interesting one and she handles it capably. On one occasion when she turns aside from her special theme to comment on the most recent claims to new evidence presented by the Baconians she puts in some sound and telling anti-Baconian facts and arguments.

THE SUB-CONSCIOUS

PSYCHO-ANALYSIS. By Ernest Jones. 127 pp. The New Library. New York: Jonathan Cape & Harrison Smith. 60 cents.

NOTWITHSTANDING all the flood of books about psycho-analysis, many of them of doubtful value, it is a pleasure to welcome this small and unpretentious volume because it speaks dependably, accurately, with authority and is written with notable lucidity—the kind of clearness and simplicity that are born of profound knowledge and appreciation of the ignorance of readers. Dr. Jones is a British medical man who was one of the first to take up with serious study twenty years or more ago the discoveries of Freud and ever since he has been working along these lines. He is director of one of the three existing clinics of Psycho-Analysis, that in London; he has been president of the International Psycho-Analytical Association, and is now president of the British Psycho-Analytical Society and of the Institute of Psycho-Analysis. In his exposition of the subject in this little book he aims to present in as simplified a manner as is consistent with scientific precision the principles of the science and to show their intimate connection with the developments of other branches of knowledge about human and animal life. "Psycho-analysis," he says, "is essentially a genetic psychology. It traces the evolution of our primordial instincts into the elaborate patterns of our conscious activities. Darwin established the continuity between man's body and the rest of life on this earth; Freud has done the same for the human mind."

INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS

IS IT SAFE TO WORK? A Study of Industrial Accidents. By Edison L. Bowers. 229 pp. Pollak Foundation for Economic Research, No. 12. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

WHY is it," asks the author of this book, "that we who have such a hatred for war condone a continual battlefield in industry, where the casualties exceed those of war? Why must thousands of persons be killed and injured annually in American industry when reliable authorities agree that 75 per cent or more of all accidents could be avoided?" Mr. Bowers, who is a member of the faculty of economics of Ohio State University, endeavors in this investigation and discussion to find the answer to this question. The workshop, he insists, is more dangerous than the battlefied, and he declares that "Since our country became an independent nation fifteen times as many persons have been killed or injured in industry alone as have been lost in the nation's battles." His inquiry into the situation and its causes is thoroughgoing, and he sets forth the results and the conclusions to which he has come forcefully and convincingly. He thinks that the problem is one of considerable complication and that it cannot be solved by working solely upon the one factor of accidents and their immediate causes, but that it is necessary to take into consideration such related subjects as workmen's compensation and vocational rehabilitation. These are factors of the problem, he thinks, fully as important as accident prevention, and in this book he treats all three as integral parts of the means of reducing industrial injuries.

After a comprehensive study of the existing situation and of the methods used and results gained in all three factors of the problem wherever an important attempt has been made to solve it, Mr. Bowers makes the succinct statement:

> The basic problem, then, seems to be to find ways and means of making industrial accidents more costly to employers than heretofore and, at the same time, of retaining the proper incentive for disabled persons to accept retraining. To differentiate between the careless and the careful employer, to conserve earning capacity whenever possible, and then to compensate for whatever deficiency remains, constitute the program. Such a program is possible only when prevention, compensation and retraining are viewed as related parts of one comprehensive whole.

The volume is well furnished with tables of statistics and charts, and all who are interested in this branch of social welfare will find it a suggestive and stimulating study of the problem.

TELEVISION

TELEVISION TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW. By Sydney A. Moseley and H. J. Barton Chapple. Foreword by John L. Baird. Illustrated. 130 pp. New York: Isaac Pitman & Sons. $2.50.

THIS is a British book concerned almost wholly with the work done and the advances made in television in Britain by John L. Baird and the company of which he is the head. In his introduction Mr. Moseley explains that the reason he wrote this particular book and not, as he had intended, "a piquant history of television," was the publication of "certain books on television written by Americans and published by English houses" that lacked, he thinks, proper knowledge of the subject and, moreover, "gave insufficient tribute to the man who had done more for television than any of his contemporaries." He concludes that "it is only meet, therefore, that we should balance matters by telling the storv of the progress of Baird television, and give in the simplest language possible an explanation of 'how the thing is done.'"

The opening chapter makes an inclusive survey of the birth and growth of television as both theory and concrete development, bringing the story down to as late as last Fall and ending with the hope that "the collation of these reports will accord to this British pioneer [John Logie Baird] the status which is his by right in the successful development of commercial television." Later chapters deal with what the authors call "the most up-to-date, first-hand information about Baird television" and afford, first, a condensed survey of the process, followed by detailed explanation and description of each piece of apparatus and its purpose and the way it functions. These accounts include both the transmitter and the receiving set. Other chapters are devoted to the method of synchronism, which Mr. Baird had closely guarded until he disclosed it last Fall; explanation of the chief functions of photo-electric cells and neons; the wireless receiver for television; the tele-cinema and tele-talkies; the development of noctovision, or the use of the invisible infra-red rays in television, and its great commercial possibilities, a field, the authors say, in which there is "no opposition to Mr. Baird's title as the originator of a science that bids fair to conquer darkness and fog"; the "bottling-up" of pictures, called "phonovision," by which they are reduced to and then reproduced from a record, as sound is treated on the phonograph; the use of color and the principle of the stereoscope in television; and a brief glance at what is being done in other countries. The book is written in graphic style, clearly and as simply as the necessary use of technical terms makes possible.

POPULAR CHEMISTRY

STUFF. The Story of Materials in the Service of Man. By Pauline G. Beery. Illustrated. 504 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $5.

ENTERTAININGLY ingenious in its conception and method of presentation, Miss Beery's sizable book is also sound and accurate in its account of the scientific aspect of the materials man uses in his daily life and of the marvels chemistry has wrought in their development and use. A line from Roger Ascham, written over three and a half centuries ago, "A small cottage, poore for stuffe and rude for workmanship," seems to have been the source of her laconic title. In her preface she pithily describes most of life as being merely "strife for stuff," and adds that "the chief difference between the hungry and the well-fed, the homeless and the well-housed, the poor and the rich—is simply stuff." Her book, then, is about the material stuff of life, the stuff of water, earth and air that man has conquered and bound to his service.

Miss Beery tells the story of all the magic discoveries and developments implicated in taking a breath of fresh air or a drink of water, each account compact of scientific inquiry, history, biography, practical uses, commercial values. In the same way she writes about foodstuffs; hot stuff—coal, petroleum, gas; cold stuff—ice and all that it means in applied science, comfort, commerce; textile stuffs born out of test tubes; noble stuff—gold, silver and platinum and the part they play in man's stuff of life; sociable stuff—the metals that are found only in combination and what they do for man; the structure of stuff—its chemical composition; waste stuff and the uses being found for it, and many other phases of man's conquest, with chemistry as his chief aid.

CHARLESTON COOKING

200 YEARS OF CHARLESTON COOKING. Recipes gathered by Blanche S. Rhett. Edited by Lettie Gay. Introduction and Explanatory matter by Helen Woodward. Illustrated. 289 pp. New York: Jonathan Cape & Harrison Smith. $2.50.

ALMOST four hundred recipes are contained in this unique cook book, recipes gathered from old Charleston families and their colored cooks, distinctive, and representative of Charleston cooking, which, Helen Woodward says in her introduction, "is like nothing else in the world." It is a heritage from the French Huguenots who settled the city, but has been assimilated and influenced by clever Negro cooks, so that, she adds, "what you eat in Charleston today is a slowly ripened mixture of French and Negro cooking." They have all been tried in the kitchen of the New York Herald Tribune Institute, and Lettie Gay, its editor, says that they have been tested and standardized and the number of servings allowed for by each indicated. They are divided into a dozen classes, from soups and canapes to desserts, with specially interesting attention given to shellfish, pilaus, sweet potatoes, breads, salads, relishes and beverages. Among them one finds such distinctive and alluring dishes as shrimp pie, squab pilau, pine bark stew—which seems a first cousin to New England fish chowder; pumpkin chips—apparently a delicious conserve; Hopping John, batter bread and Dixie tea.

Impelled by mind and spirit urge,
My plummet in the infinite,
In depths horrific and unlit,
I've sunk,—and found an end to space—
Nothing beyond—of naught a trace.

I'll brief be, tantalizing or diffuse,
I'll "jazz" their tangling thoughtlets tingle-tangle.

Now westering winds blow mists away.

And cosmic problems recondite.

Now tranquil glide we down the stream,
A dreamer sundered from his dream.

News and Views of Literary London

LONDON.

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, now nearing his seventy-third birthday, has been spending most of his time lately in preparing a collected edition of his own writings, and is beginning to be sick of the job. "It's holding up my other work," he says, "and it's a worrying task." This will be a limited edition of thirty or more volumes, to be issued by Constable at a guinea each. The first four volumes are expected to be out in July, and it is hoped that the complete set will be ready before the end of 1931. The series will appropriately start with "Immaturity," a hitherto unpublished novel written in 1879 and rejected by George Meredith for Chapman & Hall and by John Morley for Macmillan. Mr. Shaw threw it into a cupboard and proceeded to write four more novels, which were eventually published. He tells an interviewer that "Immaturity," like his other works, has no plot. It is "just a good long book which simply failed to find a publisher." It was written before he became a politician and before he had read Karl Marx. It will now be introduced by an autobiographical preface, which will afford a striking contrast between his earliest and latest styles.

The other material to appear in print for the first time will be a whole act discarded from "Back to Methusaleh" because its author considered it irrelevant; as well as an unfinished novel begun in 1888. This was discovered in MS. by his secretary two years ago, but Mr. Shaw himself was quite unable to recall it, though the handwriting proved it to be genuine. A volume in which his letters and pamphlets on the World War will be assembled will include—if he can find a copy, for he has so far been unable to lay his hands on one—an "Epistle to the Moors," in which he collaborated with A. E. W. Mason with the object of deterring the Moors from revolting from the French in the middle of the war.

JOHN MASEFIELD'S first book to appear after his appointment will be "The Wanderer of Liverpool," now in the printers' hands. It will deal with the journeys of a ship of that name. According to a leading London bookseller, the most steady demand—apart from the 8s. 6d. "Collected Poems," published in 1923, of which 80,000 copies have been sold—has been for "Salt Water Ballads" and "Ballads and Poems." The demand for the longer narrative poems is still effective enough, but the lyrical poems continue to attract more readers. Among the novels, "Sard Harker," which has sold over 60,000 copies, ranks first in popularity, with "Odtaa" a good second. The latest novel, "The Hawbucks," has sold to date something under 20,000 copies.

Sir Ian Malcolm, who accompanied Lord Balfour on his American mission in 1917 and was his private secretary at Versailles, is writing a memoir of his former chief. . . . Dr. Friedrich Rosen, whose "Oriental Memories" is announced by Methuen, is issuing through the same house an English prose translation of the "Rubáiyát," which will be a much more accurate version than Fitzgerald's. This volume will also contain a description and summary of a prose work, "The Book of New Year's Day," which is almost certainly by Omar and was only recently discovered. . . . The Oxford Poets series will shortly include the poetical work of Lascelles Abercrombie—an unusual compliment to be paid to a writer during his lifetime. . . . Obituary: S. Richmond Lee (Curtis Yorke), a novelist; Hugh Elliot (49), philosophical writer and biographer of Herbert Spencer.

The Lord Mayor has opened, at the Imperial Institute, an exhibition illustrating the wide range of finely printed books now produced by machine composition. . . . According to the Publishers' Circular, we export every year nearly 32,000 tons of books, with an approximate value of £5,000,000. Our best customer is Australia, followed by the United States, with the Irish Free State coming third. . . . The "Bermondsey Book" has come to an end after flourishing for six years. . . . "When We Were Very Young" is now in its two hundred and sixth thousand, "Now We Are Six" in its one hundred and nineteenth, "Winnie-the-Pooh" in its one hundred and eleventh and "The House at Pooh Corner" in its one hundred and fifth . . . "Autolycus," in Books of the Month, wishes more publishers would print on their book jackets information about the author, instead of silly and often misleading blurbs.

The Scholartis Press is issuing a collection of "Songs and Slang of the British Soldier: 1914-1918." . . . "Great Short Stories of the War" (Eyre) claims to represent the best work of all countries in this field. Its general editor, H. C. Minchin, has been assisted in the American section by Coningsby Dawson, in the French by André Maurois and in the German by Dr. Kurt Feidler. It consists of 56 stories and runs to 960 pages. . . . The first series of its "Crime and Detection" was so successful that the Oxford University Press is now issuing a second series.

Dr. A. C. Hill's "Man and the Multitude" (Stockwell) is a vigorous onslaught on the collectivist tendencies of the age. . . . Sir Oliver Lodge's "Beyond Physics" (Allen) is a "survey and attempted extension of modern physics in a philosophical and psychical direction." . . . "The Abbeys of Old Romance" (Palmer) will be a historical survey of the abbeys and monasteries of Great Britain, written and illustrated by C. G. Harper. . . . A posthumous volume of "Songs for Remembrance," by F. E. Weatherly, will appear shortly with Arrowsmith. . . . A posthumous work of Lane Crauford's on "Acting" (Constable) discusses its theory and practice, with illustrative examples of players past and present. . . . "The Romance of the Derby" (Hutchinson), by Alan Macey, tells the story of this famous race from its earliest days. . . . Row Harding's "Rugby" (Pilot Press) consists of reminiscences of Rugby football, not Rugby School.

A Monumental Work In German Literature

BERLIN.

THE courage of the German publishers deserves our admiration. In these doubtful times, when the arts in general and literature in particular can hardly be expected to flourish, the house of Ullstein, undaunted, has brought out its sixteen-volume history of the art of all nations. And the house of Philipp Reclam at Leipzig, not to be outdone, is now coming out with a tremendous history of German literature, going from the epic songs of ancient times to the end of the nineteenth century. The literary revolution of the later '80s is not included, so that this history stops at what may be called the pre-modern period. This historical series is to contain the amazing number of two hundred and fifty volumes—conveniently small volumes well bound in half-leather or linen or, for the benefit of students, paper-covered. The explanation for the enormous size of the undertaking lies in the unique form of its presentation. Here we have no one learned philologist—nor even several such scholars—addressing the public; it would indeed hardly be possible for a single savant to master all this wealth of material. And the purpose of the series is not the usual one of discussing the writers concerned and analyzing and criticizing their works in scientific fashion; instead, it is left to the reader to form his own opinion.

After a brief and objective introduction each volume presents selections from the principal works of the various literary periods or from the writings of the outstanding authors. The choosing and editing of these selections has been entrusted to the most important representatives of philological science in Germany, Austria and Switzerland; the publishers' prospectus mentions a number of illustrious names. The spirit of this series never descends to the feuilletonistic. All these books reveal sound scientific knowledge and are characterized by a clear and logical structure.

AT first glance we are confused by the large number of volumes that have already been published and that are planned for the future. But we soon come to realize the importance of this history—which presents the foremost literary works of the Germans rather than mere discussions of them—for those who would truly comprehend German literature in its entirety. New perspectives are opened in this way, unsuspected relationships with historic and general cultural currents manifest themselves. Frequently the past throws a surprising amount of light upon many of the cultural difficulties of the present.

Heretofore few who are not specialists in this field have had the privilege of examining rare manuscripts or editions of little known though important writings, many of which lie hidden in out-of-the-way libraries. This collection presents that which is finest and most worth knowing, for our edification and enjoyment.

One cannot estimate too highly what the spiritual development of the German people owes to the inexpensive little booklets in which the house of Philipp Reclam has for the past seventy years published all the literary classics produced in this world since earliest antiquity. The German heart is deeply moved at the realization that these modest little volumes with their valuable content and wide distribution have, despite all political confusion and counter-currents, constituted the cornerstone of the lofty temple of German national literature.

IN order to hasten the publication of the present series there has been formed a society, "Deutsche Literatur," whose members have undertaken to purchase the entire collection; a special low subscription rate has been fixed for these people. The general reader, the lover and student of literature, however, may limit his purchase to those groups of books that interest him particularly; and individual volumes are on sale at the retail book shops. The publishers expect to issue a volume every month, the books to follow one another in irregular succession.

To give you an idea of the seriousness of this collection and of what has already been done I would mention that the series of epic poetry, edited by Professor Dr. von Kralik, Vienna, will include eight volumes and will reproduce considerable portions of all the epics of the early Germanic period, beginning with the Edda. The division of Church literature, whose editor is Professor Ehrich Gierach of Prague, will content itself with four volumes, which will include selections of philosophical theological prose. Court poetry, again, is to be given twelve volumes, which will contain the fine poems of Wolfram von Eschenbach.

All this, however, still lies in the future. The books which have been published so far are the first volume of the group dealing with the enlightenment, the first volume of popular and humorous writings, the first volume of political literature, the first volume of dramas of the Baroque period and the fourteenth volume of the series dealing with the romantic period.

Class Conscious Poetry in Soviet Russia

POPULAR POETRY IN SOVIET RUSSIA. By George Z. Patrick. 289 pp. Berkeley: University of California Press.

SOVIET RUSSIAN poetry is a phenomenon sufficiently curious, original and, in a way, unique to deserve description and investigation. As one of the first books in the English language devoted to this subject, George Z. Patrick's work is worthy of one's attention. Does it, however, satisfy one's expectations? Not fully. It undoubtedly contains a great deal of interesting and useful information. But some of the author's conclusions and interpretations of facts are, in our opinion, rather superficial, open to discussion, or even erroneous.

Mr. Patrick does not review all the numerous "schools" figuring in Soviet Russia's poetic field. Leaving entirely out of his narrative the futurists, the imagists, and so on, as well as such individual poets as A. Akhmatova and B. Pasternak, he confines himself solely to that which he calls "popular poetry," to the verses of "peasant poets" and "proletarian poets" (who, it is true, make up the majority). It is, of course, open to the author so to limit the field of his investigation. But Mr. Patrick's purpose is not merely to desribe these two poetic groups. "Poetry," he propounds, "is the best means of penetrating into the soul of a people"; and his chief purpose is "to reveal the new spirit of the Russian peasants and of the Russian city proletariat through the medium of their post-revolutionary poetry." Now, it seems to us that the very problem thus set for himself by Mr. Patrick dooms him to erroneous conclusions.

There are groups in the Soviet literary field which originated spontaneously; but both the peasant and proletarian schools are two decidedly artificial products of the Soviet régime. The proletarian poets were called to life, literally overnight, by a governmental decree. Prompted by the absurd idea of "working out" in: needing not only proletarian," culture," the Soviet Government organized in 1918 the "proletkult," that is to say, the experimental laboratory for the creation of this culture. It is there that a group of ignorant beginners were hastily trained, like officers in war time, into proletarian poets, and it is thus that this school, which has existed until the present, came into being. (Of course, it subsequently was joined by many new members.) It is true that the origins of the peasant poets were not quite as artificial. Nicholas Kluyev and the late, unquestionably talented, Serge Yessenin, the spiritual fathers of the school, were poets before the revolution, not by Soviet fiat. But here, too, the Soviet Government stepped in: neding not only "proletarian," but also "peasant" poets, it began to patronize and subsidize Yessenin's imitators.

Now, can the sort of poetry written chiefly by declassed intellectuals or, rather, half-intellectuals, and read chiefly by a small communistic city public, be called "popular poetry"? Can one take these "peasant" and "proletarian" labels in earnest? And can one speak seriously—as Mr. Patrick does—of drawing from these verses "the soul" of the Russian masses? Certainly not. Some of the sincere Soviet critics themselves confess that these verses have long since degenerated into "dead official stamps." Therefore, Mr. Patrick's solemn assertions to the effect that the verses of such and such poets "prove" that "the Russian peasants think so and so," or "the Russian workmen believe in this and that," sound rather naive. Let it be repeated, however, that the informative part of Mr. Patrick's work is interesting. Mr. Patrick admits that, artistically speaking, neither the peasant nor the proletarian poetry amounts to anything. Yet of the two groups he analyzes he gives preference to the peasant poets, which is not astonishing. In their works there is at least some show of spiritual freedom (the Soviet Government is, or was until quite recently, willing to tolerate the peasant poets' occasional disagreements with the communistic doctrine, and even occasional expressions of religiousness, provided they would extol the Bolshevist revolution). But the proletarian poetry calls forth from Mr. Patrick only a sigh of regretful disapproval. And what else could it call forth? The very purpose of these poets which, to use the words of their own manifestos, is "to produce artistic images of scientific Marxian revolutionary viewpoint"; their miserable device of conveying the "collectivistic spirt" by using in their works "We" instead of "I"; the unavoidable vapid boastfulness of their exclamations to the effect that

"We, full of pride, build; we, full of pride, build;

"We build the workmen's palace——"

—how hopelessly far from real poetry all this official propaganda stuff is! Indeed, closing Mr. Patrick's book, one feels that if this Soviet attempt to create a State-controlled class literature has so far proved anything, it is that State control is an all-killing curse in art.

In the appendix Mr. Patrick gives a long anthology of peasant and proletarian poems. This, no doubt, will be of value to all those who may wish to acquire some first-hand knowledge in the subject.

Books in Brief Review

THE "NOBLE EXPERIMENT." By Irving Fisher, assisted by H. Bruce Brougham. Illustrated. 492 pp. New York: Alcohol Information Committee. $2.

IN this new book Professor Fisher follows the plan of his previous work, "Prohibition Still at Its Worst," and gives both sides of each element of the question. Apparently he has used again some of the material in that book but has rewritten it, brought it up to date, and has added several new chapters as well as many tables and graphs, an index and references. The book is especially rich in the number and variety of its statistical tables and graphs. Among the subjects which are considered, with the wet view stated first, the dry view following and each consisting of concise statements of contentions and arguments and much direct quotation, are such matters as whether or not drunkenness has increased under prohibition, the smuggling of alcohol, conditions in typically dry and typically wet States, the nation's present consumption of alcohol, the effects of alcohol on personal and public health, the economic influence of its use, whether or not modern conditions provide substitutes that take the place of alcohol in relaxation and entertainment, experiments and experiences in Canada and Britain, the possibility of repeal and of enforcement of prohibition. In a final chapter Professor Fisher summarizes the question, presents conclusions and makes some suggestions. In an introduction he includes the plan that was submitted by himself and associates to the Durant Award Commitee for making the Eighteenth Amendment effective.

OUR GRAPHIC ARTS

EARLY AMERICAN PRINTS. By Carl W. Drepperd. Illustrated. 232 pp. Century Library of American Antiques. New York: The Century Company. $4.

A LONG-TIME student of early Americana in which his tastes have led him from architecture and furniture to the graphic arts, Mr. Drepperd has specialized in early American prints of which he has brought together a large and fine collection. This volume is the result of his widely ranging studies in this particular field. It passes in review the full story of important American print-making for about two and a half centuries, from early Colonial times to the end of the Civil War. After a chapter devoted to the various print-making processes Mr. Drepperd tells the story connectedly through the Colonial and the Revolutionary periods, the period which he calls "The Golden Age of American Engraving," which was the first half of the last century, the beginnings of lithography and its development by Currier & Ives, the vogue of book and magazine illustration and early American caricatures. He deals in chronological order with the foremost engravers and print publishers and lists their most important works. The work will have very great value for collectors, while all who are interested in American prints will find it a fascinating book not only because of Mr. Drepperd's extensive and accurate knowledge of his subject, but also because he presents it in his general text as significant, each phase in its own era, of the current life and spirit of the nation.

STAMFORD'S HISTORY

THE STORY OF STAMFORD. By Herbert F. Sherwood. Illustrated. 379 pp. Sectional History Series. New York: The States History Company. $4.

IT was in the early Summer of 1641 that twenty-eight men made their tedious way through the woods from Wethersfield to the site of the new colony they had decided to establish on the shore of Long Island Sound. At first they called their new settlement "Rippowam," and the name "Stamford," by which it was to be known through coming centuries, was not given it until the next year. These twenty-eight men were of the hardy breed that life in the New World so rapidly developed, and brought with them the training and experience they had won in the course of their pioneering in Massachusetts and then in the Connecticut colony at Wethersfield. They cleared land, built houses, a grist mill and a dam, a smithy, a meeting house, measured off a common, fenced lots, planted corn, and in the Autumn brought their families and so began the story of Stamford, which Mr. Sherwood tells in this book with full detail from that Summer of almost three hundred years ago down to the present time. He writes at length and with graphic effect of those early years with their social, political and religious developments and their outstanding personalities, carries the story through the Revolution and on down through the years with full account of growth and development to as late as a year ago. He writes interestingly, with an eye for the dramatic and the picturesque in both events and people, while the extensive detail about the city's residents, especially in recent decades, will give the work added interest for Stamford's citizens.

HISTORY OF COSTUME

FROM NUDITY TO RAIMENT. An Introduction to the Study of Costume. By Hilaire Hiler. Introduction by Sisley Huddleston. Illustrated. 303 pp. New York: E. Weyhe.

THIS handsomely made and beautifully illustrated quarto volume is the work, not of a philosopher or an archaeologist, nor even of a professional writer, but of an artist who began to study costume from the artistic angle. He soon found that it is implicated in so wide a range of human activities and developments that to understand its full significance it would be necessary to approach its study from other sides also. Chiefly his purpose is interpretative, to find out why man has devoted so much attention to his clothing and ornament and to show what relation exists between these and his spiritual and intellectual status, occupations and ambitions. The author confines his study to the comparatively early stages of man's development, inquiring into the motive that led man to deck himself with ornaments and clothing, describing and discussing the forms and significance of these, first among the prehistoric peoples, then among the primitives, and afterward carrying his study through the Bronze Age and into that of Iron. The final chapter deals with costume on this continent among the primitive peoples of Mexico, Central America and Peru. The work is copiously illustrated with text pictures and page plates, some in color. It should interest not only artists but all kinds of students of man's progress.

THE SHENANDOAH

IN THE PICTURESQUE SHENANDOAH VALLEY. By Armistead C. Gordon. Introduction by Philip Alexander Bruce. Illustrated. 201 pp. Richmond: Garrett & Massie, Inc. $2.50.

THE Shenandoah Valley as a picturesque whole, its story, the part it has played in the stages of the nation's history make the many-sided and interesting theme of this book. Mr. Gordon's painstaking industry in collecting material is evident in the very great variety of scenes, incidents, people, phases that one finds in every chapter of his story. Fundamental to it all is his rather extended account of the geographical outlines and topographical features of the Valley and of the racial factors and pioneer beginnings that went into its making as a social, economic and political locality. He tells of these things first and afterward scatters references to them all through his subsequent pages.

Mr. Gordon pays full tribute to the beauty, fertility and healthfulness of the region and to its special features, its caves, forests—several national forest reservations are included in it or located along its borders—mountains, famous roads. He turns his attention to the histories of those of its counties that are of special consequence; tells the reader about its historic towns, the events that have happened in them and the eminent men whom they have nurtured; makes a rapid survey of the churches, some of them no longer existent or in ruins, that have been important elements in the Valley's civilization and the preachers who built them up and made them a power in their several localities; and he glances, sometimes at considerable length, at the men famous in the nation's life who were born or who lived in the Shenandoah Valley. There is an impressive list of these men that includes Cyrus McCormick, whose invention of the reaper so much influenced the history of mankind; General Sam Houston, who was born in the Valley but was taken to Tennessee during his childhood; Lord Fairfax, identified with its early history; Daniel Morgan, valiant Indian fighter and commander of riflemen during the Revolutionary War; General Robert E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson, Woodrow Wilson and many others.

Mr. Gordon's book would perhaps have been more interesting and certainly more easily consulted if he had given more attention to the organizing of his material so that each subject would have been treated in full in its proper classification instead of in the rambling, loose-jointed manner in which he turns from the one thing to another in each chapter. But the work is richly compounded of varied and interesting material.

SHAKESPEARE AND PEACE

SHAKESPEARE AND WORLD PEACE. With an Essay on Beethoven and World Brotherhood. By Pauline Jennings. 224 pp. New York: Fleming H. Revell Company.

IT is Miss Jennings's unique distinction that she brings to Shakespearean exposition and discussion a new and interesting theory of the great poet's underlying ideas and aims. For she sees in him a prophet of peace, a believer in friendliness and cooperation, an opponent of war and she pleads for her interpretation of his plays with impressive knowledge of them and of him and of all the modern developments of the Shakespearean controversy, with insight into the significance of their dialogue and their characters, with resourceful exposition and cogent argument. She takes up the dramas in their historical order, considering first those dealing with the times, the events and the men and women of Greece and Rome, then those concerned with the Tudor and Plantagenet kings of England and then passes on with closer and more extended attention to the plays of broader base and wider appeal wherein the dramatist found larger scope for the subtle embodying of what this author believes were his convictions about mercy and peace and his feelings for humanity.

Through all of this Miss Jennings examines and discusses situations, characters and dialogue, quotes widely from Shakespearean critics of both older and current time and makes comparative interpretations of passages whereby each throws additional light upon the others and shows by the evidence of the plays an evolution of Shakespeare's thought on the use of violence between both individuals and nations. In the poetry and philosophy of his plays she finds "a powerful agent in the furtherance of world cooperation for peace" and she thinks that "He points to a society where cooperation and mutual aid shall take the place of wasteful strife between man and man, class and class, nation and nation." "He was really," she adds, "a profoundly discerning expositor of mutual aid —a precursor of the movement for

"The Years That Take the Best Away" And Other Fiction

THE YEARS THAT TAKE THE BEST AWAY. By Barbara Noble. 325 pp. New York: Doubleday, Doran & Co., Inc. $2.50.

MISS NOBLE has taken as her theme the lines from Rupert Brooke:

> . . . The years, that take the best away,
> Give something in the end;
> And a better friend than love have they
> For none to mar or mend,
> That have themselves to friend.

Through childhood, out of her teens to twenty, the reader follows the life of Jennifer Langstaffe, watching her eager, intense seekings for inner meanings become glossed over with the necessary indifference of adult equitable living.

> In a few months, Jennifer thought, she would be twenty, and the best years of all would be over. Not, very likely, the happiest years, but those in which the little flame had burned most ardently, the whisper had been most insistent, the certainly strongest. Older people denied that—but Jennifer remembered how, even in the short while that separated her from childhood, something that had been bright and keen, winking into life at the faintest chink of light, had become dulled and unresponsive—and she knew that they were wrong.

It is very easy, when writing of adolescents, to become sentimental, or, if not sentimental, overly psychoanalytical. Miss Noble, in this, her first novel, has avoided both, has at all times hewed to the line and has drawn vividly a picture of a child in the formative years undergoing that inevitable process of, not so much disillusion as the toning down of the sensitivities. Without making her children unduly precocious she has made them distinct personalities. Without making them too tragic she has shown the small tragedies of childhood for what they are, a part of a necessary hardening, the more tragic because of its necessity.

Jennifer, the oldest girl of a family of four children, is the staff upon which the other children lean, as well as some adults. For herself she can find no person upon whom she can depend for understanding or comfort. Her cousin Clare, invalided by paralysis, she adores, and for a time there is a perfect relationship between the child and the older woman. Clare's death leaves her life empty until she finds that even the intensity of loss does not remain. Her Aunt Sydney, whom she has known in flashes, also fails her, and Terry, her fiancé, was never the dependent person she thought him. More and more Jennifer is pushed back upon herself, her capacity for being hurt lessening with each of her disappointments.

Like her, but less able to accept the world as he finds it, her younger brother James, from early childhood misbehaves to hide his disappointment; is rude to avoid being unnoticed and finally commits suicide at the age of 16 as a peevish gesture. Jennifer blames herself, believing that if she had not failed him he would never have done it. It is when she comes to Terry to have this devil of self-accusation exorcised that she realizes how useless it is for her to depend on any one for comfort. The years that take the best away have built out of a little girl eager to give and receive love a woman who will never give too much; who will receive confidences and be called upon to help, but will never in return demand assistance of any one.

Miss Noble has done a mature and beautiful piece of work, especially commendable since she has been able to write seriously of a child without falling into any of the usual clichés prevalent in fiction about children.

A VANISHING AMERICAN

GOLDEN TALES OF OUR AMERICA. Selected by May Lamberton Becker. 336 pp. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.50.

IN her preface to this collection of American short stories, May Lamberton Becker clearly states the intention of the volume. The tales have not been chosen with a view to their literary excellence or their individual worth. They have been drawn from no particular period and represent no special phase of American life. But each one enshrines, perhaps well or badly, but always with a certain realism, some aspect of American life which no longer exists, or which exists only in remote places as a quaint survival of yesterday.

> The prairie no longer blossoms before the plough, as in Judge Hall's "The Emigrants," and the last antelope is gone from the ranges described by Mary Austin; Edward Eggleston's spelling matches, impassioned sport of the '40s, survive only for the occasional entertainment of the sophisticated . . . But much that has disappeared from our national conduct has but sunk out of sight into our national characteristics.

The stories presented here are uneven in quality, and some of them, from an artistic standpoint, are nearly worthless. But each of them contains a vivid fragment of a lost way of life, and, as a whole, they succeed fairly well in demonstrating and justifying the editor's intention.

A tale like Hawthorne's "Ambitious Guest" is included in the collection because of the picture it gives us of a New England wayside inn. Dorothy Canfield's "The Bedquilt" harks back to the days when the patch-work quilt was a national art-form and the resident maiden aunt an incumbrance in nearly every American home. From "The Hoosier Schoolmaster" we have Edward Eggleston's priceless and entertaining account of a spelling match in which the whole of a village turned out to assist at the popular enterprise of "spelling down the master." Longstreet's "Georgia Scenes" furnishes another picture of pioneer school days and a long-forgotten custom, in which the pupils attempted to prevent the master from entering the schoolhouse, and thus justified him before the taxpayers of the community for granting an extra holiday.

Lucy Furman's "Christmas on Bee Tree" is a particularly graphic story of a Christmas celebration in the Kentucky mountains, and the Christmas of a lonely New England orphan is described by Mary E. Wilkins Freeman in "Young Lucretia." Some homely and appealing phases of the winning of the West are illustrated in Hamlin Garland's tale, "Mrs. Ripley's Trip," in Bret Harte's "High-Water Mark," and in James Hall's obscure and rambling chronicle, "The Emigrants." Two beloved and enduring American legends are represented. From "The Songs and Sayings of Uncle Remus" the editor has selected that ingenious episode in which Bre'r Rabbit grossly deceives Bre'r Fox; and from Esther Shephard's collection of Paul Bunyan stories she has garnered the gorgeous adventure of "Paul Bunyan's Cornstalk."

A ZANE GREY ANNIVERSARY

THE SHEPHERD OF GUADALOUPE. By Zane Grey. 335 pp. New York: Harper & Brothers. $2.

WITH the appearance of this new novel Harpers celebrate the twentieth anniversary of their association with Zane Grey as his publishers. Since they brought out early in 1910 his "Heritage of the Desert" they have published almost two score of his books, the majority of them novels, with several volumes about fishing and other outdoor interests and a sprinkling of books for young readers. The list of titles is of rather staggering length, even for twenty years' work, and shows Mr. Grey to be an industrious author. But he has had ample reward for his toil, for the leaflet in which Harpers announce the anniversary says that over 11,000,000 copies of his books have been sold in this country alone, while to this huge figure sales in foreign countries would probably make a considerable addition since his novels have been translated into several languages. These figures mean that the American public has paid well over $20,000,000 for the privilege of reading Mr. Grey's novels. Current critical standards did not look favorably upon the kind of fiction that Mr. Grey writes, although the sales of his novels indicate that the reading public still likes it. His stories and those by writers of the introspective, psychological fiction—in which studies of states of mind and feeling largely take the place of plot and action—are at opposite poles. But the public never turns a deaf ear to a good story-teller, whether he be a great novelist or not. And Mr. Grey has trained himself well in the older fashion of the novel and is a master of its technique. He is thoroughly familiar with its mechanism and handles it with delicacy and finesse. His plots are carefully constructed, without flaws, and he builds up to his climaxes of both action and emotion with a sure and steady hand, with just enough hint of direction and purpose to rouse and hold the reader's interest, delight his belief in his own perspicacity, because he thinks he can guess what is coming, and keep taut his emotional suspense. But it is all factitious—just a story that neither illuminates life and human nature nor pictures them in realistic colors.

In this new novel Mr. Grey turns his attention to our own time and writes about life on a modern ranch in Northern New Mexico. His hero, young Clifton Forrest, has been a soldier in the World War and some time after its end, after he had been reported as "missing" and had spent many months in a hospital being brought back to life, the reader meets him crossing the ocean and half the continent to go home, as he believes, to die. But although he is broken, tortured, almost dead, he recovers health and strength. When he reaches home he finds that the big ranch with its fine old Spanish mansion which his father had owned, has by chicanery and much crooked dealing become the property of Jed Lundeen, who formerly had been his father's tenant. Lundeen has a daughter and of course the two young people fall in love. But between their fathers there is a feud whose bitterness and anger and deadly hate find vent in flaming words and threats and venomous action. Out of this beginning Mr. Grey develops a complicated tale of rapid action, dramatic situations and tense emotion in which the two elders by their evil words and deeds mess things up so badly for themselves and their offspring that the outlook for the young people seems decidedly hopeless until the story nears its end. It is all written in the romantic spirit, "the light that never was" hovers ever over its hero and heroine, it is compact of action and emotion, its pictures of its locality are true and vivid—in short, Zane Grey at his best.

GENTLE SATIRE

THE WELL-MEANING YOUNG MAN. By Luise and Magdalen King-Hall. 303 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $2.

THAT same Providence which tempers the wind to the shorn lamb and takes care that drunkards do not sustain broken bones has a soft spot in its providential heart for irresponsible young men whose doctrines of non-activity would get them into serious trouble were it not for some benign and intervening Fate.

Such a young man is Daniel Cavanagh, whose parents, in spite of his constant failure to hold a position for more than a few weeks, are still sustained by "lively faith, boundless hope and a reasonable amount of charity." Charm is the only definite attribute of character possesed by Daniel at 19, and at 19 he had not yet learned how to capitalize that commodity. It is decided, finally, that he be sent to Palermo, where a branch of the family is engaged in successful wine-growing, and where the youngest member may be assured of a promising position.

Given a certain amount of money, budgeted by his father, for the trip, Dan runs afoul of the plans immediately by staying at the wrong hotel in London and spending far too much for his room. A young friend, who is planning to drive from Cologne to Italy, invites Dan to accompany him and sends him ahead by plane to Cologne. But the friend does not turn up, and Dan finds himself in Germany when he should be in France, without money when he should have plenty, and too far from Palermo to arrive on the day he is expected. Several days' stay in Freiburg, in the interests of a girl he meets on the train, further complicates his plans. A frantic wire home for money fails to get results because Dan, unknowingly, has sent the code "Telegraph health of baby. Shall I come?" instead of what he thought was "No money, in great difficulty, send at once £10."

Knowing nothing else to do, he sets out to walk to Italy. This time fate steps in in the guise of the Prin-

Senegalese are slowly starving to death. The French, better treated, and having extra food supplies sent them from home, are strong enough to be used for fatigues, including a nightly burial party. When the commandant, Captain Elbing, finds that the sergeant, in addition to his mastery of German, can use a typewriter, he makes use of him to type reports and even lends him to the pastor of the neighboring village to be employed in typing a collection of sermons.

From the pastor, with whom Dumaine was soon on a friendly footing, he learned about the Reichendorfs, hereditary lords of this bleak land. Their ancestors in the days of the Teutonic knights had built the great castle near the camp. Though modernized in almost every succeeding century, it was now obviously in a bad state of dilapidation. General Count Hugo von Reichendorf, veteran of the Franco-Prussian War, lived there in seclusion with his young kinswoman, Axelle von Mirbach, the destined bride of his surviving son Dietrich. Three other sons had already fallen in battle, and Dietrich was in command of an assault battalion in Picardy. Axelle managed the household, now reduced to the narrowest straits because of the extravagances of the dead sons; in fact, only an aged woman servant and old Gottlieb, the butler and factotum, remained of all the retinue.

Introduced into the castle to repair the electric light system, Dumaine encounters Axelle. Their love is told with a delicacy and sincerity rare in present-day fiction. M. Benoit's skill in portraiture is best attested by his depiction of the old General for whom war is the beginning and end of all things. In his perfect fairness to the hated Junkers, his appreciation of their qualities which the world at large and even many sections of the German people have ignored, Benoit has done a service to truth; and he has written a book which, because of its fine character analyses, possesses an interest beyond its value as fiction.

UNDILUTED ADVENTURE

THE HAWK. By Roy Vickers. 304 pp. New York: The Dial Press. $2.00.

LORD DORLING, a young Englishman who, following the war won fame as a stunt flyer under an alias, is in prison for a crime which, of course, he never committed, when this story of undiluted adventure opens. He is extricated from jail through the efforts of Jabez Malleron, legal adviser of high government officials, and, incidentally, the head of a dope smuggling ring, who believes he can use Dorling's flying ability in his illicit trade. Without discovering who is the head of the ring, Doring escapes from its power only to find it has kidnapped the girl with whom he is in love. He rescues her, discovers and reveals the identity of Malleron, and finally clears himself of the crime for which he was imprisoned.

CANADIAN TALES

THE FLYING CANOE. J. E. Rossignol. 301 pp. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart. $2.50.

MOST of these tales are told by a raconteur to a little and familiar company of listeners sitting around a fire in the chill of evening. They have a quaint folklore quality which is their chief charm. Many of them are concerned with young daughters of the habitants and with their simple and quietly romantic love and marriage. In the background are the worthy older parents or guardians sketched in with humor and delicate perception; in the foreground, is youth with its sensitivity, its acceptance of old standards, and its loves which usually turn out rightly, as loves should.

J. E. Rossignol writes well—very quietly and with no attempt at startling effects; he understands these people of the rural districts, the distinctions between their psychology and the psychology of the town bourgeoisie he characterizes excellently. There is none of the formal short-story technique here, just the simple delight of the storyteller spinning his naïve yarns. Back of the scene is the beauty and wildness of the Canadian forests and the domesticity of the farming districts. The author is a splendid interpreter of his people. Whatever plotting he does springs naturally from the life such peasantry would lead. One charming story has to do with a young habitant girl selling vegetables at market, another with a young city lad who would marry a habitant girl, and another with the loyal and tender friendship between two men. The book will interest those readers who love people and who read not for melodramatic situation, but for a picture of life.

"SERIOUS THINKERS"

OFF THE ARM. By Don Marquis. 205 pp. New York: Doubleday, Doran. $2.

IN the old days Don Marquis would not have let his constituents down like this. "Off the Arm" is far from his best work. The tale tells of a sentimental middle-aged novelist called Wadleigh, who fell yearningly in love with the wife of a younger and more arrogant novelist. Wadleigh met them in Paris first. There they were the centre of a very arty group, a group that Don Marquis satirizes for all the world as though this sort of humor had not been sent to the antimacassar files ten years ago. Even Hermione's hallmark, "a little group of serious thinkers," turns up again. Hugh Cass, the younger novelist, doesn't appreciate his wife, of course. She had been a waitress dealing them off the arm, and she was a little too wholesomely undistinguished for him. But to Wadleigh she is beauty incarnate, and the kind completely characterized by his school of authors as the up-to-date girl with the inescapable allusion to bobbed hair and legs.

Wadleigh meets them both again in New York, after they have been separated. The girl is now working as a waitress in Greenwich Village. Her husband has become famous with his first novel. There is a generous portrait of the contents of a club called the Gramercy that members will not fail to recognize, in this part. Finally, they all meet once more in Hollywood, where Hugh's star has been setting while his wife has miraculously become a cinematic sensation. There, in swift order, they all get their deserts.

IN THE JUNGLE

MUKARA. By Muriel Bruce. 278 pp. New York: Rae D. Henkle Co., Inc. $2.50.

BEFORE Colonel P. H. Fawcett left on his ill-fated expedition into the interior of Brazil in 1925 he discussed with his friend, the late George Lynch, the possibilities of a novel based on his explorations in that country. Mr. Lynch later gave Colonel Fawcett's personal notes for such a novel to Miss Bruce, with the suggestion that she carry out his wish.

"Mukara," her first novel, is a clever weaving of fact and fancy into a highly fictionized story of what such an expedition might have found, had its search for the ruins of the city supposedly built by white Indians in a pre-Mayan civilization been successful. The story is concerned chiefly with Richard Kirby, son of the explorer leading the party, and his initiation into the secret wisdom of the Valley of Light. There are barbaric dances, weird temple rites, battles between the forces of light and dark, architectural wonders, fabled treasures and secrets of wisdom lost to the world through many civilizations, to astound the explorers.

Incredible as much of the story is, it holds one's interest for its factual basis and the fascination of civilizations of which we have no record except that which may be gathered from crumbled ruins and strange legends. The style is clear and readable, well away from the flowery and stilted phraseology into which the subject matter might so easily lead.

A LIGHT ROMANCE

THE MAN SHE BOUGHT. By Maysie Greig. 313 pp. New York: Lincoln MacVeagh, The Dial Press.

UNDER a decidedly misleading title, "The Man She Bought" is a light and well-told romance cut along conventional lines. When Dorothy Ashworth refuses to marry Peter Kelway because he is not wealthy, Peter goes to the Canadian Rockies to forget. There he meets Fran scarcely a week before the death of her father leaves her alone and friendless. Out of compassion when she begs him to take her away, Peter marries Fran only to discover later that she is an heiress and the daughter of a famous English actress, who had deserted her husband and child years before.

Fran loves Peter, but he is still infatuated with Dorothy, who is continually on the scene both in Canada and after they return to Peter's home in England. Made thoroughly miserable by her inability to play the rôle in the country that Peter expects of her, and by his obtuseness regarding the antagonism between Dorothy and herself, Fran seeks her mother in London. The latter part of the book, dealing with the meeting and subsequent relationship between mother and daughter, is handled particularly well with restraint and without sentimentality.

A HE-MAN PSYCHIATRIST

GOLDEN DAWN. By Peter B. Kyne. 275 pp. New York: Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $2.

THIS product of the ever-ready pen of Peter B. Kyne continues his accustomed formula. His ingredients may differ from time to time, as in this book, to show perhaps that he, too, can follow the changes in fashion. Since psychoanalysis has invaded the precincts of literary art, industrialized fiction must always pay homage. But these traces of so-called higher learning are only the outward flourish; the inner spirit still bravely trails its ancient glory. Kyne may give us a psychiatrist for a hero, as he has in "Golden Dawn," but take away the surface fact, and what remains is the old ado about success and brawn. All the talk of psychology is so much palaver. When the "baffling" case of Nance Belden, alias Penelope Gatlin, is brought to our young and clever doctor it means only the beginning of an adventure, of the usual kind, ending where all such adventures have led in the past.

YOUNG LOVE

THEY LOVED TOO YOUNG. By Lesley Storm. 353 pp. New York: Harper & Brothers. $2

AN old-fashioned love story is "They Loved Too Young." One of the characters given to reading library romances is asked what her last is about. "A young lady and a young man," she promptly replies. That is just what "They Loved Too Young" is about, except that to vary the plot John, the young man, married Joyce, another young lady, before he discovers that after all it is only Hester, his first love, who counts.

In spite of her tedious plot, Miss Storm, fortunately, has not the sugary style that usually accompanies similar novels. She writes straightforwardly and develops her characters moderately well. She succeeds perhaps better with the villainness than with the heroine, for Joyce, the faithless, selfish and stupid wife, is a far more real person than the supposedly fresh and gallant Hester; and Mrs. Monk, Joyce's scheming and disappointed mother, not without her human side, is the most alive of them all.

The ROYAL WOMAN
by Heinrich Mann

The intrigues of the Empress Eugenie, the beautiful wife of Napoleon Third, are charmingly presented in this extraordinary novel, through the acting of middle class characters. A vivid masterpiece of this author's profound irony.

cess La Fiorivanti, Horatio Swann, Harry Ames, Bianca, a maid; Gene Tunney, a panther and a large white Pannonia-Svitza, the chauffeur for which has passed out from an overdose of his favorite drug. It is necessary that the Princess and her retinue arrive immediately at the Schloss Erlenburg, in the Austrian Tyrol, where Rex Guggenheim is gathering together the cast for a miracle play in which she hopes to play the lead. Although his handling of the car is erratic, to say the least, Dan is pressed into service as driver, with the promise of coming shortly to Palermo.

From here on the central interest of the story slips from Dan to the Princess. Among the group of writers, actors, actresses, press representatives and musicians gathered together at the Schloss for the play, the reader may discern more than one person whom the newspapers have made public characters. Conversation is "intellectual" and wearying. Drinking is a pastime that is overindulged. Dan is rather lost in the shuffle, but comes to the top in time to save the Princess from suicide and aid her out of other difficulties.

Miss Magdalen King-Hall, who, under the name of Cleone Knox was responsible for the delightful novel "Diary of a Young Lady of Fashion," and her sister have here evolved a light satire which lacks only a consistent centring of interest to make it altogether equal to the former book. It falls short as soon as the main character is allowed to take a back seat while others perform, but in spite of this the gentle smile with which the reader starts the book will probably persist to the end.

TALES OF THE TROPICS

THE FOOLS' PARADE. By John W. Vandercook. 270 pp. New York: Harpers. $2.50.

HERE are six stories telling what the tropics do to the white man and what the white man does to the tropics. No effort has been spared, apparently, to make the book look exotic; the cover is pink and green and gold and black; there are voodoodledoo drawings throughout, and the text is printed on heavy cream-colored paper of the sort usually reserved for the masterpieces of Mr. Michael Arlen. Mr. Vandercook's stories seem to be based upon actual narratives gathered in South America and in Africa, changed here and there to fit the exigencies of fiction plot design. They are neither striking nor unusual. But they are better than the average stories that seem to flow in an endless ribbon from these hot localities.

The first story, "The Fools' Parade," is an account of how five men escaped from the penal colony in French Guiana. This concerns Cayenne, not Devil's Island, which is a part of the same system. The story is told to the author by the one man who survived. There is considerable verity in the telling, though at times it becomes a rather conventional recital of ghastly horrors and privations in the jungle.

"Djombe River" is an African story about a soft-headed young American who has gone out to work with an older timber man on a concession up the river. Gene, the young man, asks his fiancée to come out from the United States and marry him, after her father dies. On the night before her steamer arrives he is guilty of misconduct with a garish lady of the seaport town. Nevertheless the marriage takes place. It is not consummated. On the way up to the concession Gene is drowned while crossing the Djombe River. The girl goes on. Totton, the older man, receives her. He had planned to leave Africa with his thirty years' savings and begin life. But he marries her instead. They are happy for a time, but it won't work. Djombe River in the end settles all their fates.

"Funk" is an example of the working of voodoo among the crocodile worshipers, and how it affects a man who becomes too engrossed in their rites. Its ending, hinging upon the mortal terror induced in a man who has unwittingly nailed his own coat down in the dark, strikingly resembles a story told in Chambers's "The Book of Days" about a totally different episode that once happened in England, when a man who had wagered that he would go into a haunted church and stick a fork in a coffin, to prove that he had touched it, was later found to have swooned. He also had unwittingly fastened himself by his coat in the dark, and thought that mysterious powers had clutched him.

"A Man of Africa" is a well-written portrait of a black ruler returning to the primitive in time of trouble. "The No Good Coaster" is about another man who became obsessed by Africa and came to a bad end as a result of it. "Black Man Trouble" explores the suppressed enmity that lies between the black and the white races in the light of an abortive mutiny while a ship is being loaded with cargo.

YOUNG MORONS

FRANKIE AND JOHNNIE. By Meyer Levin. 212 pp. New York: The John Day Company. $2.

WITH meticulous care, Mr. Levin has examined the love-making of an incoherent and pretty stupid young couple in "Frankie and Johnnie." His has been an arduous research into the contemporary idiom, manners and morals of Chicago's poor and uninteresting adolescents. His job is workmanlike throughout and the finished narrative bears every semblance of credibility but the exposition is little more interesting for that. The author has resolutely refused to give his subjects even a modicum of sympathy and since their experiences are scarcely significant, one finds it difficult to remain interested in them. The highly documented realism of the tale does little to relieve it from tedium.

The theme of "Frankie and Johnnie" is one of little substance. Johnnie is a mail-order-house clerk, endowed with a dull intellect and dull sensibilities and unschooled in romance. His existence is shaped by movies, tabloid newspaper headlines and a dreary round of routine work. His relaxation takes the form of random companionship with other boys as witless as he himself until he meets the sister of one of these, Frankie. The attraction between the pair is gradual and unromantic. Both of them vary so completely from the ideals each has set of the ultimate lover that it is only a febrile curiosity that impels them to the gestures of love-making.

Out of this thin material, Mr. Levin has contrived to write a full-length book, although it obviously suffers from repetitious material. Frankie and Johnnie, intent on courtship without marriage, are forced to carry on their affair secretively. They do their wooing on the sofa of her family's apartment, fearful that her father and mother will return and surprise them at any time; in motion picture houses, or in his car parked at some conveniently quiet spot. The natural culmination of their love-making is interrupted by a police officer, and resigned to the futility of their romance, they drift apart.

Mr. Levin's handling of characterization and dialogue are excellent. He succeeds in making his two principal characters always life-like, no matter how uninteresting, and their speech is as awkward and meaningless as that of any young couple from the same environment. It is difficult to understand, however, why they warrant an extended examination under the stress of such minor experiences as they undergo.

THE DAYS OF THE BORGIAS

THE BULLS OF ROME. By Ludwig Huna. Translated by Madge Pemberton. 309 pp. New York: Brewer & Warren, Inc. $2.50.

ONCE more the shocking but brilliant and fateful career of the Borgia family has formed the material for a novel—for three, in fact, as "The Bulls of Rome" is the first of a trilogy. The present volume is interesting reading, but makes no contribution of particular value to literature or history.

Mr. Huna, for the sake of his plot, makes but one departure from the accepted characterizations of the Borgia family. Lucrezia is turned into an impossibly beautiful and virtuous creature, struggling with complete success against the evil suggestions and example of her brother Caesar and her father, Pope Alexander VI. She is in no sense a Borgia in this book.

There is a strain of exaggeration that amounts in some cases to caricature about the melodramatic creatures of this novel, which tends to destroy credibility. Nevertheless, the framework of the story is essentially true to fact, and it is obvious that a great deal of research has gone into the making of it. And because the facts in themselves are so lurid and extraordinary, the book is naturally an absorbing one to read. The author misses no opportunity of a sensational sort, and minces no words in writing.

His story begins about five years after the election of Alexander and centres about the lives of three fictitious characters, two brothers and a sister, the slender threads of whose lives were caught up in the magnificent woof of the Borgias' destiny, only to be lost in time, among hundreds of other threads, when their end came.

Through Caesar, "the incarnation of all evil" in Mr. Huna's portraiture, they all met their death. One was a friar, a disciple of Savonarola, whose fiery denunciations of the luxury and corruption of the papal court, brought imprisonment and a swift execution. The second was a beautiful young girl, ravished and finally driven to suicide by Valentino, "the Lord of all Devils," to quote the author again.

The third character, who is the hero of the book, was a poet who dared to love and win the love in return of Lucrezia herself. Their devotion is the one beautiful thing in the otherwise unrelieved blackness of events. Its culmination in the final scene of the story, where Serafino dies by the hand of the enraged and jealous Caesar, is magnificently conceived. One cannot deny Mr. Huna's ability to tell a story.

A PRUSSIAN HEROINE

AXELLE. By Pierre Benoit. 316 pp. New York: Lincoln MacVeagh. The Dial Press. $2.50.

THAT only twelve years after the World War a Frenchman should publish a book whose heroine is a Prussian of the Prussians, a very ewe lamb of Junkerdom, is a matter for remark. But that this heroine should be depicted as a girl compact of all those ineffable beauties of character and soul communicable only by the subtlest hints and evasions, savors of the incredible.

"Axelle" is a war book, yet as different in kind from the run of war books as, let us say, Sir Thomas Malory's "Morte d'Arthur" is from a historical treatise on Arthurian times composed by a modern realist. The horrors of battle, the slaughter and maiming, the orgies of survivors of a campaign striving to compress in a few weeks or days of leave the years they no longer dare hope for—all these are missing; for the hero of this tale is a prisoner who has already endured two years of captivity when we first meet him in December of 1917.

Sergeant Dumaine tells his story of the last year of the war in Reichendorf, a prison camp in easternmost Prussia, whither he was transported with a Franco-Belgian contingent from Erfurt in the Thuringian Mountains. Graduate of the Central School of Engineers, a man of character as well as education, Dumaine possesses advantages which even a Prussian camp commandant can appreciate and use. On first view the camp impresses him as a sinister place, a huddle of barracks girdled by barbed wire entanglements, close to the sea—in a barren marshy country, a desolate wind-swept land. Hundreds of Russians and

A First Novel by Llewelyn Powys

APPLES BE RIPE. By Llewelyn Powys. 304 pp. New York; Harcourt, Brace & Co. $2.50.

ALTHOUGH Llewelyn Powys in his earlier days wrote a handfull of short stories that were included in the volume "Ebony and Ivory," he has not until now turned his talents in the direction of the novel. And yet one questions the fitness in calling "Apples Be Ripe" a novel for other than the purpose of rough classification. The Powyses—for besides Llewelyn there are also, as every one knows, Theodore and John Cowper--have such individuality of genius that nothing they do is likely to have more than a resemblance to what other people do. "Apples Be Ripe," therefore, is really many things, and least of all a novel in any precise meaning of the term. In part it is poetry, it is largely an idyl, it is to some degree a fable, and always is it gossamer rather than substantiality that fills the pages of the book.

In common with his brothers, Llewelyn Powys is an incurable romantic, although, no doubt, they all would prefer to be called realists. And herein lies the chief difficulty for the reviewer in dealing with their writings, for the task of disentangling the real and the unreal is no easy one. It was not easy to do with "Wolf Solent," John Cowper Powys's solitary venture into fiction; it has not been easy to do with any of the stories or novels by Theodore Powys, and it is not easy with "Apples Be Ripe." Perhaps, for a hurried statement, it might be said that Llewelyn Powys has employed a realistic setting and realism of detail, together with a naturalism in dialogue, to conceal rather than to reveal the essential ideality of his theme or thesis. For "Apples Be Ripe" distinctly has a thesis—love. Llewelyn Powys is a crusader in the cause of love, he is eager to break a lance in defense of lovers, and that lance is tipped with romantic flame. Only in this light can the present commentator see "Apples Be Ripe," for thus viewed it becomes a book fraught with a meaning it otherwise does not possess. It becomes a book fraught with delicate meaning.

To make these somewhat cryptic utterances a trifle more clear, it may be well to turn to the story of "Apples Be Ripe." The title is from an old English song, the sort of thing country balladists probably once somewhat slyly sang in Dorset. And its sly suggestion is that girls (a thesis not admitted by Victorians) may be ripe for love. Thus we see that the fable begins even in the title.

The story centres around Chris Holbech, who grew from being a sensitive child to becoming a super-sensitive man. He is under-master in a school maintained by a narrow-minded clergyman-pedagogue. Chris, who has scarcely ever allowed his imagination to stray in the direction of women, marries the niece of the headmaster, a not-unengaging little person, but one overly formal. The wife, Adela, does not become a real flesh-and-blood creature under Powys's hand; nor does Chris acquire more than partial corporeality. The other persons in the book are mere shadows. All of which strengthens this writer's contention that the book is primarily a fable.

Llewelyn Powys is dominated by the psychology of that school of scientists which grants to sex a controlling rôle in life. Marriage awakens in Chris desires of which he had not before been conscious; and as these are not reciprocated the union with Adela becomes a mismating. The two separate. But Holbech, dominated by his idealism, seeks to protect a young serving maid who has been seduced by a village lad and gets himself into an awkward situation. It is at this point that the indulgence of the reader is most urgently necessary, for the whole scene of Chris's compromise is given a reality which is merely specious. Chris takes the girl back to her parents—the gamekeeper and his wife on the estate of a neighboring squire. Chris himself becomes a farm-hand, and a wandering flute-player. But he is free. Thus Powys's school-master loses his life that he may save it. To be free in a world in which none is free of cant and hypocrisy is, according to the Powys thesis, to achieve man's one desirable goal.

The rest of the story passes quickly. Chris brings the gift of love to two women, and then dies. Of these two women one had been his childhood playmate of a week by the sea, when he had felt for her such love as a child might be capable of. Thus Powys reverts also to that psychological theory which insists that a childhood experience is never erased, but will, if opportunity present, become dominant in adult life.

"Apples Be Ripe" is, then, a delicate interweaving of a plausible realism, psychology and fancy. Gossamer we have called it, and gossamer it remains. Like those strange, fanciful Dorset tales of his brother Theodore, this first extended fiction from the pen of Llewelyn is for the few rather than for the many. Llewelyn Powys is well aware that the world is not to be changed. Adela and her uncle symbolize the world. Mr. Powys derides them with a gentle irony. Chris Holbech, the fool, the world's jester, is the only wise one. The book is humorous—for those who can perceive its humor. It is richly English in its background and its people. There is more than a touch of Fielding. And for some it will be a rare literary fragment. Others are likely to pass it by.

New Mystery Stories

SEVEN SUSPECTS. By Florence Ryerson and Colin Clements. 308 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $2.

THE authors of this story are both well-known scenario writers, and they have successfully applied the principles of scenario writing to the construction of a mystery novel. But it is not a Hollywood story, nor does it deal with the lives of movie actors and actresses. The only person in the book who has any connection with the motion-picture industry is Jimmy Lane, a scenario writer, who solves the mystery of the murder of Carmina Lopez, the opera singer, by treating it as though it were a plot for a scenario. That is to say, he assembles the known facts as they come to light and tries to fit them into a sequence that would make a good motion picture. His theory seems to be that the movies are not so far removed from life as some critics would have us believe. Whatever one may say as to the theory, the plan works out very well indeed. To be sure, he cannot discard such facts as do not fit into his scenario, as he could if they were merely imaginary; but their failure to fit often leads him to examine them more closely and to discover that they are not what they seem to be. The scene is laid in the mountains near San Francisco, and what happens there is the culmination of a drama that began more than twenty years before the story opens.

THE SHOP WINDOW MURDERS. By Vernon Loder. 302 pp. New York: William Morrow & Co. $2.

In a shop window filled with wax dummies dressed in fancy costumes are two figures which do not belong in the picture. One of them proves to be the dead body of the proprietor of the store, Mander by name, and the other is that of a young woman, Effie Tournour, chief buyer in the millinery department. Mander has been shot and the girl has been stabbed in the back. A Mauser automatic, from which one shot has been fired, is found in the shop window, and a knife, with bloodstains on it, is found in one of the lifts. The muddy wheeltracks of an airplane are discovered on the store roof, which has been equipped as a landing field for a newly invented gyrocopter. It is well that Inspector Devenish of Scotland Yard is a patient and painstaking sleuth, for he has to follow out a great many devious trails before he learns a part of the truth. He never does learn all of it, but he makes what appears to be a very good guess.

THE GLOYNE MURDER. By Carl Clausen. 266 pp. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.

With the exception of the detectives, nearly every person in this story has contrived to behave in such a manner as to draw upon himself or herself suspicion of having murdered Miss Gloyne. One has an overelaborate alibi, another has disappeared just previous to the murder and several others have been seen in the vicinity of Miss Gloyne's apartment at or near the time when she met her death. And nearly all of them tell evasive stories to the police. Some of them have adequate reasons for lying, while others appear to do so merely for the purpose of making the case more difficult. What really happened is discovered by Lieutenant Ames and told by his wife. The story is a puzzler, and it offers a method of murder which, so far as we remember, is entirely new.

MANHATTAN NIGHT. By William Almon Wolff. 252 pp. New York: Minton, Balch & Co., $2.

The night life of New York forms the sinister background for this story of love, blackmail and murder. The charcters are men and women who frequent the night clubs in a feverish search for pleasure and the underworld creatures who prey on those who quest for entertainment leads them to forbidden fields. Martha Thayer, returning late to her penthouse apartment, finds there the dead body of her husband, Tack Thayer. She telephones first to Peter Wayne, a young man with whom she had become very friendly, although she does not return his love. The detective who is placed in charge of the case jumps to the conclusion that Martha is involved, probably as an accessory, in the murder of her husband. There is much to support this theory. It is a matter of common knowledge that the Thayer marriage has not been a happy one and that Martha Thayer has been seen much too often in the company of Evan Ross, who is something of a gigolo. Fortunately for Martha, another detective, animated by a desire to show up his superior officer, takes a different view and succeeds, with the help of Wayne, in tracking down the real murderer. The characters are well drawn, and the author's narrative style is as effective as it is simple and straightforward.

THE VOICE IN THE CLOSET. By Herman Landon. 349 pp. New York: Horace Liveright. $2.

The setting of this story is a duplex apartment on Park Avenue—an apartment into which and out of which various persons come and go without the knowledge of servants or attendants. There is in the book a diagram of the apartment, but it is so incomplete and inaccurate that it is of no help to the reader. It shows, for example, an ordinary single door where sliding double doors are indicated in the story. In this apartment Duncan Forbes is shot dead while sitting at his desk in the libarary. In an adjoining drawing room Clyde Armstrong is singing a song of his own composition while Mrs. Forbes accompanies him on the piano. When the song is ended, Mrs. Forbes has an uneasy feeling that something has happened in the library, and she asks Armstrong to open the doors. He does so, and they discover the body.

Lieutenant Delmar, who is assigned to the case, goes in for psychological deduction, disregarding much of the ordinary routine of detective work. There are times when he might have saved himself some trouble by devoting more attention to detail, and there are other times when the plain common sense of his assistant is of material assistance; but, on the whole, Lieutenant Delmar does very well. We should have liked it better had the author not found it necesssary to end it with one of those tiresome round-ups of all the suspects.

THE MAN WHO WAS THERE. By N. A. Temple Ellis. 274 pp. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.

Here is mystification plus. Even after finishing the book one does not know how Montrose Arbuthnot ferreted out the truth about the murder in the bungalow on the Isle of Wight. It is all very well for an author to keep his readers in the dark up to a certain point, but they should be entitled to a convincing explanation in the final chapter. Arbuthnot's explanation is far from satisfactory, unless one is prepared to believe that the man is able to put two and two together and thereby solve an Einstein equation.

THE MYSTERY OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS. By Fielding Hope. 305 pp. New York: The Dial Press. $2.

As a scene for a murder it would be hard to beat the British House of Commons with the House in session. A Socialist member, who is just about to make an important speech, is stabbed through the heart, and no one knows who did it. But that is only the beginning. Within the next few days several other members are murdered in a similar manner, except that in each case the thrust seems to have been delivered by a left-handed person, whereas the first murder was a right-handed job. It is a promising beginning for a mystery thriller, but the solution imposes too much of a strain upon the reader's credulity. If the deeds described in this book were possible, the world would no longer be safe for democracy or for anything else.

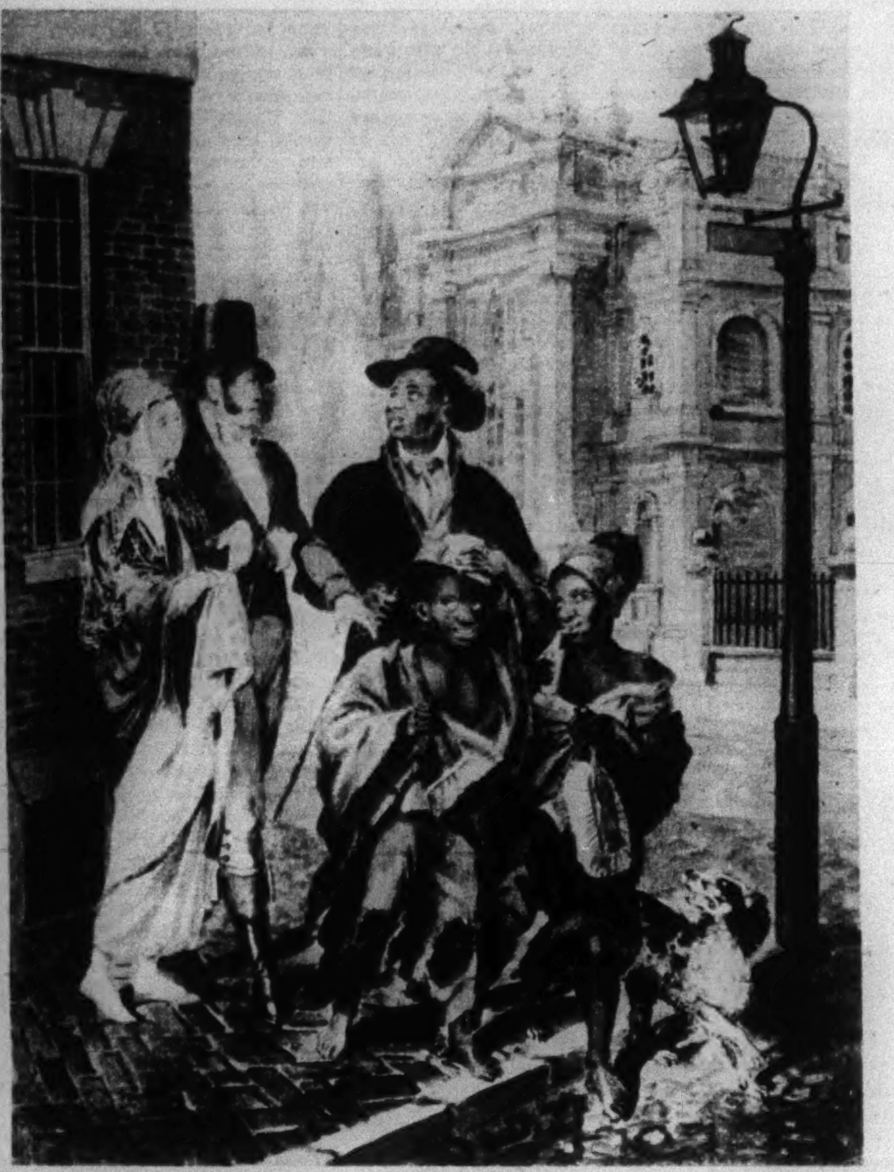
As a Russian Saw Us in The Republic's Youth

The Memoirs of Paul Svinin and His Water-colors Provide An Interesting Commentary



"Worldly Folk" Questioning Chimney Sweeps and Their Master Before Christ Church, Philadelphia.

The Illustrations on This Page Are From Watercolors by Paul Svinin, Reproduced in "Picturesque United States of America."

PICTURESQUE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA*, 1811, 1812, 1813. Being a Memoir on Paul Svinin, Russian Diplomatic Officer, Artist and Author. Containing Copious Excerpts from His Account of His Travels in America, With Fifty-two Reproductions of Water-Colors in His Own Sketch Book. By Avrahm Yarmolinsky. Introduction by R. T. H. Halsey. New York: William Edwin Rudge. $15.

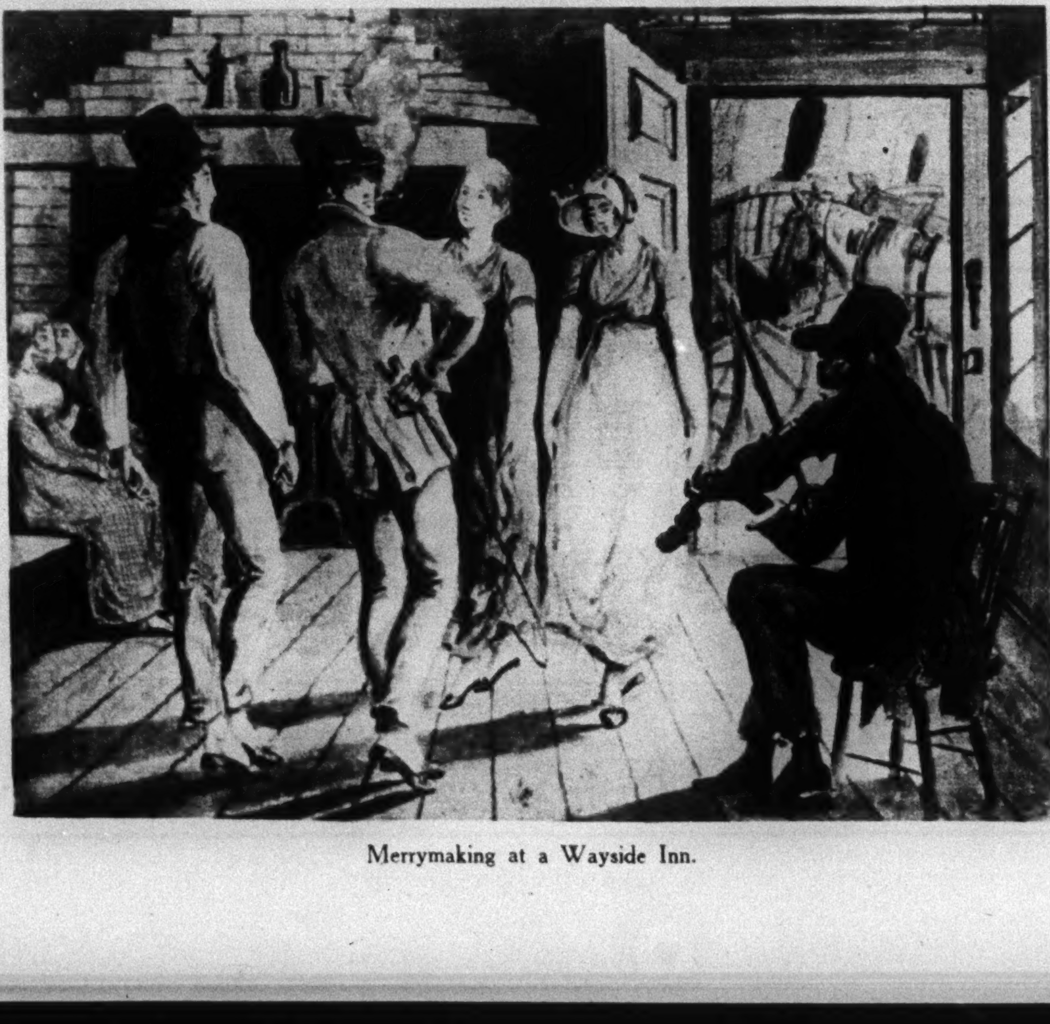
By H. I. BROCK

MIRRORS of ourselves as others saw us—both friends and enemies from across the sea—are not lacking for the period of our first adventure as a nation on our own between the American Revolution and War of 1812. Many curious travelers looked us over and reported upon our landscape, our roads and rjvers, our manners and behavior, and our political acrimonies. But mainly these were writers. Therefore, peculiar interest attaches to a report upon us by a foreigner who presents his eyewitness impressions of the closing years of this pregnant period both in narrative and in pictures.

The interest is heightened in this case by certain other facts. First, the reporter was a Russian. Second, his pictorial record in watercolor includes not only backgrounds but a vivid representation of life as the artist encountered it on the streets of Philadelphia and elsewhere. Finally, the very fact of the existence of the pictures had dropped out of knowledge until an accident placed the portfolio of the sketches—in a French dress—in the hands of that indefatigable collector of the stuff our national backgrounds are made of, R. T. H. Halsey.

It is true that the best of the sketches—those which record first-hand bits of the passing show in the days of James and Dolly Madison—deal with Philadelphia. But Philadelphia was still in those days our show-window city. And after all, though Niagara Falls and the Natural Bridge seem to represent the Northern and Southern limits of the artist-author's explorations, he is fascinated by the beginnings of the steamboat and by our bridges (which are already phenomenal for span, though they are still of wood) and he does not neglect the stage coach.

Pavel, or Paul Petrovich Svinin was an educated and accomplished young Russian, who had served in the Mediterranean with the fleet of Czar Alexander I during the wars with Napoleon and who was a member of the Academy of Fine Arts at St. Petersburg. He came to this country in 1811 as secretary to the Imperial Russian consul general at Philadelphia, Daschkoff, remaining some twenty months, during which time he contributed to the Philadelphia Folio an article on the Don Cossacks and a picture of his Emperor. When he got back to St. Petersburg he published "A Picturesque Voyage in North America," which was translated into German and Dutch and, in some of its editions, at least, was embellished with six of the fifty-two sketches from the collection which this book presents as a whole. The text of the volume consists of two parts. The first is an introduction by Mr. Halsey, which tells the story of the discovery of the sketches—they were picked up in Russia by a wartime Red Cross worker—and recites something of the curious researches by which having got hold of the Russian text, Avrahm Yarmolinsky of the Slavonic Department of the New York Public Library, sleuthed out the facts about Svinin, who was so far unknown to fame when the hunt began that he had not so much as a card to his name in the catalogue of the Bibliothèque Nationale. The second part is Mr. Yarmolinsky's memoir of Svinin, presenting not only the man but the most important of his observations on America culled from the "Picturesque Voyage" and others of his writings.



Merrymaking at a Wayside Inn.

It appeared to Svinin that there were certain likenesses between the United States and Russia. Here are the concluding sentences of his parallel:

> In Russia, as in the United States, the unfortunate and the persecuted find an asylum and a home. Lastly, it is little more than a century since from the bosom of impenetrable forests and marshes inhabited by bears and wolves, rose the superb cities of St. Petersburg, Philadelphia and New York.

Perhaps both Russia and the United States have changed a bit in the matter of the first item. But the servant of the Czar who made the peace of Tilsit could hardly see so far into the future. That he saw further than most in that direction, however, may be gathered from the following: "Mechanical inventions," he writes in 1815, "have completely replaced human hands in the United States." Thus to his sanguine eyes in the year of the battle of Waterloo, that wonder of the world, which we are accustomed so flatteringly to admire in the mirror of ourselves as the latest and greatest miracle—the mechanization of life—was already as good as accomplished. In 115 more years we have only carried the process a little nearer perfection.

In certain other matters it would appear that we have gone backward. Recent news items have spread the rumor of riots and fires in our prisons and carried an earnest reminder from the very highest authority of our need of more and better cages for our bad men. Our record for crimes of violence is widely advertised. But of modest Mr. Madison's United States we read:

> Each one of the inmates of the prisons here is permitted to do the kind of work with which he is familiar or for which he has an inclination. The order and cleanliness in them are astonishing. Prisons here are more in the nature of factories. Here humanity is not tortured—it is merely punished; it is not degraded—it is merely deprived of liberty, the first good.

To be sure, there are those who are not so certain nowadays—either in Russia or America—that liberty is a good at all. But other times, other slogans. What compels attention sharply is that Svinin adds: "In America we find fewer examples of depravity, murder or theft, than anywhere else." We can only reflect that Chicago did not yet exist and that Philadelphia, still overshadowing New York, set the pace of decorum and served as the model of decent behaviour to the nation.

Not that our far-seeing young traveler from the Nearest-East of Europe did not foresee the rise of New York to metropolitan eminence. He was a man of vision and imagination. And he based his vision on facts. He drew a sketch of deck life on one of Robert Fulton's new steamboats on the Hudson (within four years of the first official voyage of the original Clermont) and wrote a glowing account of the elegant quarters provided for the passengers, the excellent service of food and the prodigious speed of the craft. He tried to get the rights to the invention for Russia, and painted an emotional word-picture of what steam on the great rivers of his native land would do for the peasants.

> How many thousands of brawny hands (he writes) will be restored to the fields that had been tilled by the feeble hands of deserted wives and decrepit ancients. Joy, conjugal love and fidelity will establish themselves in the once-abandoned villages, and the peasant who at barge-towing met exhaustion and sometimes death will find behind the plough true riches and health.

He did forsee that in a modern mechanized Russia the Volga boat song would be stilled by the put-put of the motor and the plow replaced by the communal tractor. Anyway, he failed to get the monopoly of the steamboat for Russia. Fulton himself got it and built no steamboats for the Volga. It was not until 1817 that the new invention got working on the Neva.

The passionate partizanship of Americans in politics astounds the visitor and the electioneering methods disgust him, in spite of his sincere, even ardent, admiration for our country and our people. He notes that a Federalist holds a Democrat in such abhorrence that he will not marry his daughter to a member of the hostile tribe or, if he can help it, even do business with him or any of his hateful kind. The Democrat feels the same way about the Federalist. As for methods:

> The agents of the parties publicly offer to give food and drink to those who will grant them their votes, orators in saloons and in public squares display their eloquence, argue, purchase votes; sometimes it goes as far as violence and fisticuffs. Such are the elections of a free people!

Interesting but not without the bias and the malice (sometimes) of the rival in the craft are the young Russian academician's observations on our own artists, from Gilbert Stuart, whom he praises, to Rembrandt Peale, at whom he scoffs. Let it suffice here to note the visitor's perspicacious explanation of the fact that in this country it is portrait painting which has been "brought to the highest pitch of perfection." He writes:

> The Americans being disposed to vanity, have a weakness for bequeathing their likenesses to posterity. For that reason, portrait painters are consistently in demand and are very well paid. The most wretched paint-slinger receives no less than $20 for a bust portrait, and some men get as much as $100.

If M. Svinin could only have looked in on one of our art collectors of the present and seen that $20 multiplied to $20,000, even for "paint slingers" of the period, he would have seen that his picture of a really mechanized age was lamentably incomplete.

New Books of Poetry

tion, both as poetry and as philosophy.

INTELLECTUAL THINGS. By Stanley J. Kunitz. 63 pp. New York: Doubleday, Doran & Co. $2.

One may be puzzled to know why the unusual poems by Stanley J. Kunitz in the little book, "Intellectual Things," should have been collected under so esoteric a title. The explanation lies in the line from William Blake, "For the tear is an intellectual thing." And there is something slightly reminiscent of Blake in Mr. Kunitz's poetry. There is not the imaginative other-worldliness of "Tiger, Tiger," or of the poem to a lamb, or of "Ah, Sunflower." Nor is it to be expected. Once, and once only, will a William Blake be born. But this young American, with his first volume of verse, has brought something of a new tone, a fresh outlook. In proof take this, "Promise Me":

Only, when I am sudden loss
Of consequence for mind and stair,
Picking my dogged way from us
To whom, recessive in some where
Of recollection, with the cross
Fallen, the breast in disrepair:

Only, when loosening clothes, you lean
Out of your window sleepily,
And with luxurious, lidded mien
Sniff at the bitter dark—dear she,
Think somewhat gentle of, between
Love ended and beginning, me.

This is highly convoluted verse—too highly convoluted, perhaps. Yet none the less is there clarification, a seeming contradiction, one in some degree, at least, characteristic of Blake; although the latter has a rush to his lines which Mr. Kunitz, we fear, will never attain. And herein lies the crux of the matter. The author of the pieces in "Intellectual Things" has approached his subject intellectually instead of approaching it emotively, to use a word adopted by Thomas Hardy to express the poet's function. Nevertheless, Stanley Kunitz, in "Promise Me," achieves an impressive expression of his thought, and although impressive expression does not alone make poetry there is not poetry where such an achievement is absent.

One more brief quotation will be made as showing the high reach of his thought. The lines are a sestet—from a sonnet perhaps too intricately called "So Intricately Is This World Resolved":

Lover, it is good to lie in the sweet grass
With a dove-soft nimble girl. But, O lover,
Lift no destroying hand; let fortune pass
Unchallenged, beauty sleep; dare not to cover
Her mouth with kisses by the garden wall,
Lest, cracking in bright air, a planet fall.

This is such mastery of the form as shown by Helene Mullins. But in the cosmic significance of the figure the poet conveys the magnitude of the spiritual abyss before which he adjures one to quail. It is good to see such imagination finding expression in American verse. We trust that "Intellectual Things" will be but the first collection to come from the pen of a poet of unusual promise.

THE BRIGHT WORLD AND OTHER POEMS. By Charles Norman. 86 pp. New York: William Morrow & Co. $2.

The most striking and ever-present characteristic of the verse of Charles Norman, as found in his new volume, "The Bright World," is the author's zest for life. There is something hale and bountiful and wind-swept to his pages. His publishers tell us that Norman is happiest when traveling. So it appears in his poems. He scans the seas from the bows of "a fine ship." Wind in his face, gulls on the waterfront, city streets—these are the stimulus of his imagination and the material of his thoughts.

When the wind blows like this,
I remember the windy port,
Montevideo. I was there
ir years ago in the sunlight,
In the bows of a fine ship,
And the work didn't matter.

* * * * * * *

If you would have peace,
Forego the foreign cities;
Winds blow from their streets
Into my mind, my heart knows it,
And I remember them all
By a trick of wind, by faces,
By gulls on the waterfront.

Mr. Norman is uneven. The first five lines of this first stanza are poetical, and so are all seven lines of the second stanza. The line, "And the work didn't matter" is veriest prose. And, indeed, Mr. Norman seems throughout his book too often to be a poet of beginnings and suggestions rather than a poet of accomplishment. He has several pieces in blank verse that are semi-dramatic, centring around persons—Telemachus, Faustus, Arthur in Avalon and others. There are lines in each of these pieces which are dramatically powerful, moving and beautiful; yet not one of the pieces, with perhaps a single exception, is wholly successful. There are echoes of Marlowe. Indeed, we are informed that Mr. Norman is doing a biography of Christopher Marlowe. We believe this excerpt will be liked. Faustus speaks:

Here on this earth, nothing that is not youth
Is anything, and youth is everything;
And I am older knowing that now no more,
No more will Spring fire my veins as once
When lilac and the blossoms of the May
Had their fierce sweet counterparts in me;
When all the world went singing-mad, and I
First saw those silver battlements afar
Where a king's daughter was a prisoner.

At present Charles Norman is mainly derivative; but he has outbursts in which he is momentarily his individual self. And there is so much of sheer exuberance behind it all we feel certain that as time goes on he will lose hold on his progenitors and walk vigorously alone.

Objection and Reproof

Editor The New York Times Book Review:

Your reviewer, Mr. Ybarra, is not well informed. The King of Norway, Haakon VII, has much Bernadotte blood in his veins. King Gustavus of Sweden is a cousin of his mother, Louise, the late Queen of Denmark. Louise was the daughter of Charles XV, King of Sweden and son of King Oscar I, who was son of King Charles XIV, the former Marshal Bernadotte.

The son of King Haakon, Crown Prince Olav, being married with the Swedish Princess Margarita, his cousin, there will be more Bernadotte blood in the veins of the Norse kings in the future. And presumably will there also be Bernadotte blood in the veins of the rulers of Belgium, the Belgian Crown Prince being married with the Swedish Princess Ingrid, sister of the Crown Princess Margarita.

Editor The New York Times Book Review:

Your Book Review section of Sunday, April 6, 1930, contains a review of "The Autobiography of Frank Tarbeaux," in which your reviewer states that Mr. Tarbeaux "was born in Colorado, the first white child to have that honor, almost seventy-eight years ago * * *."

Part of Colorado became the property of the United States by virtue of the Louisiana Purchase from France in 1803; part belonged originally to Texas, annexed in 1845, and the rest was ceded by Mexico in 1848. That which belonged to Mexico was originally a part of the Royal Province of New Spain, a Spanish possession, explored and colonized in the early sixteenth century. It is almost a certainty that white Spanish children, many of them of noble blood, were born within what is now the State of Colorado, as early as three hundred years before the said Mr. Tarbeaux saw light.

Never have you read a book like it.

Here is a strange and brooding book; a gay and sombre book; a cruel and wayward book; a wicked devil of a book; a perfect treasure of a book; a book to make you wonder…

It is the amazing story of twelve good men, jurors, and why they do what they do to one bad one; a tale rich in wisdom and laughter, glamour and gore. It is kin with those mad, glad, bad brothers, Rabelais, Villon, Mark Twain and Lawrence Sterne.

Franz Ferdinand, Who Died That Day in Serajevo

Three New Books on the Austrian Crown Prince Place The Hapsburg Heir in a New Light

Franz Ferdinand in 1912.

From a Portrait by Kasimir Pochwalski Unikum.

ERZHERZOG FRANZ FERDINANDS WIRKEN UND WOLLEN. (The Work and Aspirations of Archduke Franz Ferdinand). By Leopold Chlumeczky. 378 pp. Berlin: Verlag fuer Kulturpolitik.

ERZHERZOG FRANZ FERDINAND. (Archduke Franz Ferdinand). By his physician, Dr. Victor Eisenmenger. 200 pp. Vienna: Amalthea Verlag.

FRANZ FERDINAND, DER ERZHERZOG - THRONFOLGER. (Franz Ferdinand, the Archduke-Crown Prince). By Theodore von Sosnosky. 255 pp. Munich.

By EMIL LENGYEL

ON June 28, 1914, Crown Prince Franz Ferdinand, Archduke of Austria, fell victim to the bullet of a young Serbian student. His death was the pretext, even if not the cause, of the World War. That his death should be violent was written in the stars. His life was violent, too, a succession of explosions which shattered his nerves and his position in the world. He hated and loved violently. He hated Emperor Franz Joseph, whom he was to succeed, and the sovereign hated him. He hated the Italians, English, Magyars, Poles, Serbians, and was hated by them. He was egocentric, bigoted and autocratic, an Oriental potentate on a rampage in a semi-constitutional monarchy.

Franz Ferdinand's capacity for affection was just as violent. He stormed through all obstacles and swept away all dynastic objections when this greatest hater in the House of Austria finally found a woman on whom he could lavish the pent-up love energy of a futile life. A modern Prometheus, he hurled defiance at the gods of his day, but found only tender words for the woman who was to share his tragic fate.

History has treated him with something akin to scorn and contempt. He was the man with the iron mask who never showed his real features. He was called a sphinx because people did not take the trouble to understand him. His immense capacity to repel frightened away even those who like to investigate the motives of violent emotions. His rudeness discouraged attempts to understand him. The world has forgotten that he had been brought up under abnormal conditions and that at a very critical period of his life, when he overrode the objection of court and married a girl much inferior to him in social position he displayed admirable qualities.

It is strange that the three books under review should have been published almost at the same time. They are a new approach to the understanding of this great problem of the Hapsburg dynasty. The three authors must have felt that the time has come to rescue Franz Ferdinand's memory from ignominy. Perhaps the new estimate of the life and achievements of the former Crown Prince is linked up with the new valuation of the life and achievements of Emperor Franz Joseph. Professor Redlich has shown up the hollowness of the imperial taboo and adduced the matured opinion of a critical age to show the part of the sovereign in the downfall of Austria. Franz Joseph was wrong, and the conclusion is logical that his great opponent, Franz Ferdinand, was right.

The authors in these volumes have mostly elaborated their personal reminiscences and the documents in their own possession. For about thirty-five years longer the real truth about the dead Crown Prince cannot be known. Eternally jealous of the popularity of members of his House, Franz Joseph gave orders that for fifty years the correspondence of Franz Ferdinand must be kept under lock and key, sealed with his own hands and preserved in the archives.

Given the temperament of Franz Ferdinand and the conditions under which he lived at court, he had to become a highly strung instrument of violent extremes. His ambition was overpowering, elementary. In the seat of the mighty sat Emperor Franz Joseph, a new Sun King, awed by his own power. Franz Ferdinand had the torrential energy of the man of action, whereas Franz Joseph was backed by the mystic power of his crown. They were two knights in medieval armor, unaware of the breaking of a new dawn. The struggle was uneven, and for Franz Ferdinand the only way out was to fall like the defeated hero of a Shakespearean tragedy. It was a strange destiny that his death was the prelude to the formidable catastrophe that broke on mankind.

Both the Emperor and his Crown Prince were autocrats, but the latter was in the opposition and that made all the difference in the world. Franz Joseph saw himself in an apotheosis, the centre of the universe. Franz Ferdinand battered the walls of the Hofburg to save the life of the dynasty. The idea of nation was incomprehensible to both of them. The Emperor resented it as a personal insult, and the Crown Prince saw in it merely a new form of lèse majesté. "Après moi le déluge," was the Emperor's unavowed policy. The deluge did come, and Herr Chlumeczky, the author of an admirable volume on the Crown Prince, summed up the situation with great insight when, upon learning of his death, he explained: "This means the end of the dynasty."

Herr Chlumeczky's book deserves more extended comment than the two others. He is a historian of great reputation, a former diplomat, the son of a Minister who had helped to make Austrian history. His book is intuitive, rather than didactic, the result of intimate association with his subject. His portrait of the dead Archduke is not the traditional chiaroscuro of a heartless villain and angelic paterfamilias. He does not conceal the shortcomings of the hero, merely explains them—very intelligently, it must be admitted—through the influence of congenital characteristics and environment.

The Archduke's hatred against the world originated, Chlumeczky reveals, during the time when he was suffering from tuberculosis of the lungs and had been given up as a hopeless case. Friends, political admirers and parasites turned away from him and with touching solidarity prostrated themselves before the new god, Archduke Otto, the heir presumptive. "You and my valet are my only friends," the Archduke complained to his physician, Dr. Eisenmenger, in his characteristically tactless vein. When the Archduke recovered, he found himself being sent around as an imperial messenger boy, placed "at the disposal of the All Highest Orders of His Majesty." He had wanted to do heroic things, but it did not take him long to discover that under Franz Joseph heroism was as great a handicap as a surplus of brains. He beheld through the mist of incense the carved image of a bronze Buddha, inscrutable and torturingly impersonal, his uncle, the Emperor. At each step he was confronted with obstruction, the smiling images of small Buddhas, old Admirals, decrepit Generals, antiquated Hofrats, the survivors of a dead age.

Franz Ferdinand was not in the crowd of the incense burners. While he had not a towering intellect, he had the good sense to see that the monarchy was headed toward a nirvana of destruction and death. In order to forestall such a fate he wanted to overhaul the foundations of his future realm. The cardinal point of his policy was to take what he thought an excessive power from the Hungarians and divert it to the other nationalities of the empire. The vehement disclaimers of these three authors notwithstanding, it is a well-established fact that the Archduke was obsessed with a violent Hungarophobia. In a letter to a friend he complained of the perfidy of the Magyars and asked in a burst of indignation whether this was surprising in a nation that had enthroned Kossuth as a hero and introduced civil marriage—an unforgivable sin in the eyes of this devout Hapsburg.

In order to weaken the influence of the Magyars he wanted to transform the dual monarchy of the Austrians and Hungarians into a triune kingdom of Austrians, Hungarians and South Slavs. Serbia would not have been included as—the letters published in these volumes show beyond doubt—he had no aggressive intentions against any of Austria's neighbors. It shows the chaotic condition of pre-war diplomacy that Serbia saw in Franz Ferdinand the most ferocious opponent of the Gross-Oesterreich policy. How greatly mistaken the Serbians were is evident from the letter which the Archduke wrote to his aide-de-camp about General Conrad von Hoetzendorf, chief of the General Staff:

> Try to tame Conrad [the Archduke wrote] and make him stop shouting about war. It would be, of course, tempting to roast the life out of Serbia and Montenegro, but we have no use for cheap laurels if by our intervention we can cause a general European imbroglio and have the enemy on two or three different fronts. Just because a few foreign army Captains talk nonsense Conrad does not need to mobilize a corps.

If the Archduke's ideas had been followed the World War might have had a different aspect. He wanted to revive the three Emperors' alliance of Austria-Hungary, Germany and Russia. The Italian alliance, in his very emphatic opinion, was not worth the paper on which it had been covenanted. Exposed on three sides to the fire of the largest maritime power, Italy had to march with Great Britain. Moreover, public opinion was so excited over the irredenta in Trentino and Trieste that a war in the tow of the hereditary enemy, Austria, would

Two Poets Who Essay the Narrative Form

POINTS EAST. Narratives of New England. By Rachel Field. 126 pp. New York: Brewer & Warren, Inc. $2.

THE ROOSEVELT AND THE ANTINOE. By E. J. Pratt. 44 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

THE effect of a good story is often heightened by putting the narrative into verse, and for this reason one is always glad to find narrative poetry on the publishers' lists. Two such books are at hand. One is called "Points East," nine tales by Rachel Field of the folk who live on the islands off the coast of Maine. The other is "The Roosevelt and the Antinoe," by E. J. Pratt, a retelling in metrical form of the gallant rescue at sea which stirred all hearts a few seasons back.

The country where grow the pointed fir trees has long been a region offering rich human and character material for writers, and Rachel Field is not an untried adventurer among the Maine folk. She knows their sturdy worth as well as their amusing crotchets. She writes with a fine appreciation of the deeper qualities of her people, as shown by her prologue, "A New England Window":

Long, long ago through this same pane of glass
Eyes peered for Indians, saw the trappers pass;
Watched trees fall back and houses multiply
Round that white steeple, saw the coach roll by,
And ships with lovely names skirt ledge and bar:—
Rainbow, Sea-Garland, Martha, Morning Star,
Gold on their bows and canvas billowing
Whiter than any orchard in the Spring.
Out of this window even then, as now,
Green turned to scarlet on the maple bough,
And lives to legend—brittle grown and dry
As leaves we snatch at when the wind blows by.

While it must be admitted that Rachel Field has not done notable narrative verse in her little book, the very simplicity and artlessness of her method render her stories engaging and, in the main, effective. It is a fair question, however, whether the author of fiction who chooses the poetic rather than the prose form should not be held to just as rigid narrative standards. The stories which make the volume "Points East" would have gained from a critical working over at the author's hands. Miss Field has done good work; but not such good work as she might have done.

Mr. Pratt's poem is to be accepted for the honest effort that it is to perpetuate the supreme seamanship of Captain Fried and the heroism of his men. The saving of the crew of the Antinoe was one of the most thrilling tales which ever came out of the sea, and Mr. Pratt conveys anew that thrill. The passing of hour after hour, with the Roosevelt striving in vain to fire a line across the decks of the foundering Antinoe, is succinctly told, with crescendo and suspense. Then the final rescue by the bravery of a boat's crew. Like Rachel Field, Mr. Pratt has fallen short of the ultimate in narrative verse. But he has done his job in a workmanlike manner. It would be well if there were more of his ilk to attempt a permanent form for the many stirring events that fill the news pages year by year.

Crown Prince Ferdinand

have been extremely unpopular in Italy. Franz Ferdinand clearly saw the outcome of Austria's mistaken foreign policy, but the Ballplatz had its own ideas and they were diametrically opposed to his.

In his fits of temper, which were more frequent than his associates liked to admit, the Archduke found himself at cross purposes even with his own divinity, the dynastic traditions. In a letter, hitherto unknown to the world, he challenged the infallibility of the laws of his house:

> If one of us takes a liking to a woman and wants to marry her [the Archduke wrote] our petty bureaucrats always find some trifle to frustrate one's plans. The result is that we are related to one another twenty times over. No wonder that half of our children are epileptics or idiots.

Dr. Eisenmenger, for years physician of the late Crown Prince, contributes many anecdotes to his psychical portrait. Franz Ferdinand was incapable of restraining himself even when he was certain to have the entire world against him. He liked only soldiers and disliked poets and other "dreamers." At the unveiling of the Goethe monument in Vienna, where he appeared on behalf of the Emperor, the Archduke remarked to his physician with his usual bitterness: "Goethe and Schiller have their monuments in Austria, while many Generals who have rendered great services to the fatherland get nothing."

Dr. Eisenmenger is very outspoken in criticism of Franz Ferdinand. Not only was he inconsiderate, but also inconsistent and whimsical. He had flashes of insight but little capacity for endurance. Yet Eisenmenger agrees with the two other authors that the Archduke was the victim of his unhealthy surroundings. As a man of the people, he might have aspired to greatness; as one of the elect, he was doomed to failure."

The Fateful Year

Carl Schurz was applauded for saying, apropos of the demand for the execution of Southern "traitors," "If there is any man who ought to hang for supporting these principles, it is Andrew Johnson." Apropos of a race riot in New Orleans, Charles Sumner, the Radical leader in the Senate called Johnson its author, compared New Orleans to St. Bartholomew's Eve, and threatened, "A guilty President may suffer the same retribution which followed a guilty king."

The main object of the Radicals was not to help the Negro, but to stay in power. With the white Southern vote suppressed and the Negroes voting their way, they could do it. As Gideon Welles noted, it was not philanthropy but partisanship that governed them; and, as Professor Beale shows, they made no bones of it, even the supposedly idealistic Sumner. The nation suffered, and still suffers, from the overturn they made in its system; but at least the form of government was preserved, even though it was impaired, and the gratitude of this generation for that is due to Andrew Johnson.

A new war book is announced for early publication by Dodd, Mead & Co. It's title is "Captured," and the author is Ferdinand Huszti Horvath, who was an officer in the Tiroler Kaiserjaeger and is now an artist in New York. Mr. Horvath took part in the first Austrian offensive and was later caught in a counter-attack by the Russian armies. He was captured by the Cossacks and taken to a prison camp, from which he made his escape to Scandinavia, returning later to his own country. Mr. Horvath is also illustrating for Dodd, Mead & Co. a new edition of Poe's "Raven."

By HENRY E. ARMSTRONG

MR. HAYWARD has done an excellent piece of work in assembling the achievements of the Antarctic explorers, including Admiral Byrd, in a spirited and informing narrative.

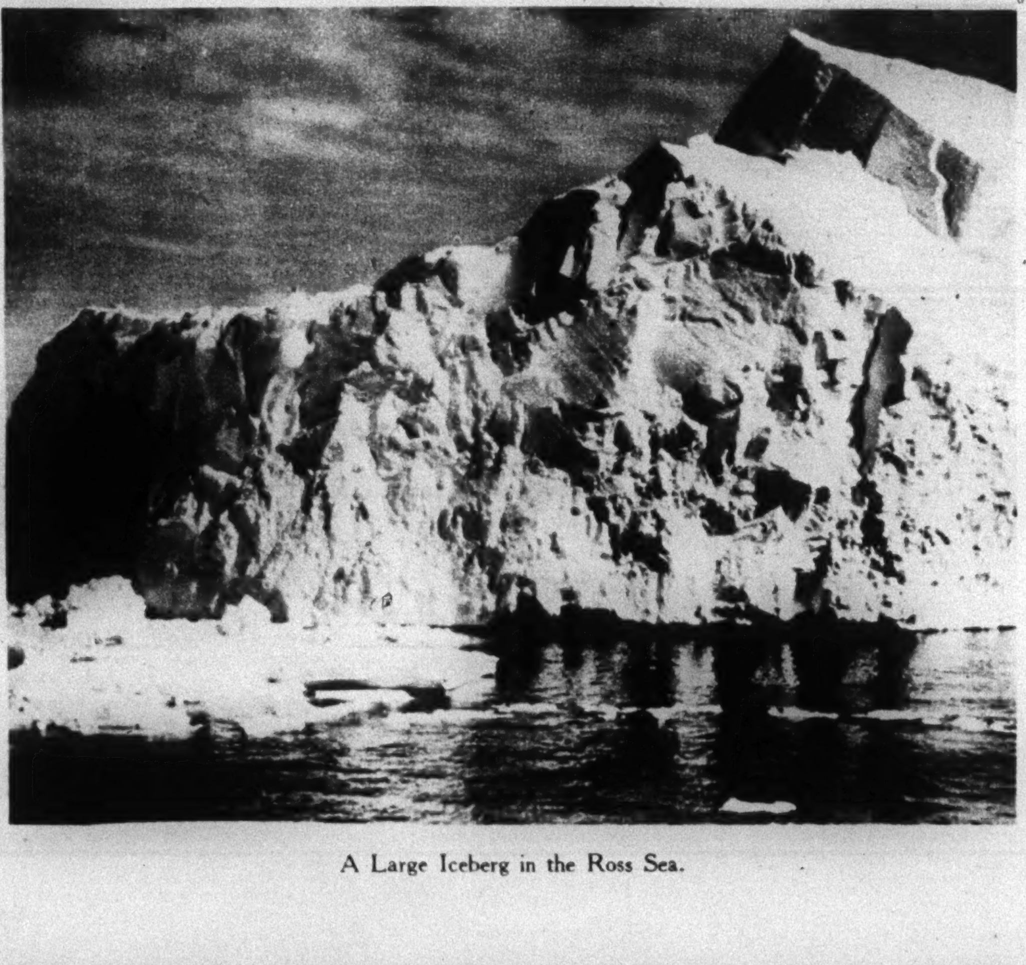
For the most part it is based upon the books of the Admiral's predecessors, which are elaborate and expensive. Mr. Hayward, who has sympathy and imagination, misses nothing of interest in the record of Antarctic adventure. He is fortunate in his treatment, for it is a man's book as well as a boy's book; indeed, it has a universal appeal. Never were more heroic figures than the explorers who staked their lives to wrest from the great ice continent its secrets. After more than a hundred years of contact and penetration only a beginning has been made, in spite of the fact that three explorers, Amundsen, Scott and Byrd, have reached the Pole. Thousands of miles of coast have not been charted—much of it has not been seen—and it remains for the aviator to reach and map the interior away from trails to the South and the Magnetic Poles and the limited regions in which Mawson, Scott, Shackleton, Wilkins and Byrd have made discoveries in this century. No one would think of doubting their contributions to geography, but they must be considered as pioneers in a vast territory, the greater part of which is still a blank. A foreword by Dr. John H. Finley tells a story of Amundsen which should be quoted, because it illustrates the effacement of polar explorers who do great things:

> The memory of Captain Amundsen comes of my going with him to ex-President Roosevelt's for luncheon one day at Sagamore Hill. He, coatless on that chill day, carried under his arm the two large volumes of his book on the South Pole to present them to his enthusiastic host. When Mrs. Roosevelt was later glancing through them I called her attention to the most interesting illustration, that showing the men with their dogs and sledges at the South Pole. "And which of these is you?" asked Mrs. Roosevelt. "Oh," said Captain Amundsen, "I was not there; I was the photographer."

It is one of the merits of Mr. Hayward's book that he blazes the way for Antarctic discoveries in the twentieth century by passing in review the work of hardy explorers before the days of steam, beginning with Captain James Cook, who crossed the Antarctic Circle at three points between 1772 and 1775 and circumnavigated the polar sea. He was the first to encounter the ice pack. Among his discoveries were the Sandwich group of islands and South Georgia, now a whaling base, bleak and forbidding. There he came upon herds of seal, and his reports brought down "rough and ready men wholly undaunted by the terrors of the polar seas" to hunt the seal. Among them were Benjamin Morrell and Nathaniel P. Palmer, both of Stonington, the latter the master of a forty-ton sloop appropriately named The Hero. Palmer was only 20 years of age. The Russian Bellinghausen, representing his sovereign, Alexander I, who must be credited with the first discovery of land within the Antarctic Circle, Peter I Island and Alexander Island, was amazed at the youth and intrepidity of Palmer when he boarded the flagship and showed his log and charts. To him the high-minded Bellinghausen said:

> I name the land you have discovered Palmer Land in your honor, but what will my august master say, and what will he think of my cruising two years in search of land that has been discovered by a boy in a sloop little larger than the launch of my frigate?

Palmer's find was a group of islands near Graham Land, but he seems also to have been the first to report the South Orkney Islands.



A Large Iceberg in the Ross Sea.

The sealers and whalers were among the first Antarctic explorers. One marvels at the risks they took in such vessels as Bellinghausen truthfully describes. The privations they endured are almost incredible in these days of elaborately equipped steam and power ships. The British group, Kemp, Balleny, Biscoe and Weddell, are perpetuated on maps of the Antarctic. A sea on the opposite side of the continent from Ross bears the name Weddell. In the present year Sir Hubert Wilkins found it an impenetrable chaos of bergs and floes. Sir Ernest Shackleton in an attempt in 1915 to make a landing on its ice shelf in order to sledge across the pole to the Ross Sea lost the Endurance in the pack, and thereby hangs a tale of terrible adventure which the author tells most impressively. It was John Biscoe, a sealer, who discovered in the African quadrant Enderby Land, named after a London shipowner, in 1831. It was almost a hundred years before his claim was confirmed by Sir Douglas Mawson. Stout John Biscoe sailed fifty degrees of longitude south of the Antarctic Circle. The Royal Geographical Society honored him with a medal. Kemp Land seems still to be in doubt, but the Balleny Islands in the Australian quadrant are conspicuous by a mountain of an altitude of 14,000 feet, and they are on the map to stay. These indomitable sealers ushered in an era of exploration by American, British and French commanders who were sent to the Antarctic by their governments with high hopes. Among them was Lieutenant Charles Wilkes, U. S. N., whose reputation has had to withstand the buffets of criticism which impeached his good faith. The author says:

> The rivalry between d'Urville and Wilkes and the harsh judgment of Ross with respect to the American officer's claims were the fuel for discussions which reflected no credit upon those involved in them.

James Clark Ross will always be an outstanding figure in Antarctic

Books and Authors

SOMETHING very like a revolution is taking place in the American book publishing business. Four publishing firms have already announced drastic reductions in the prices of new books, and it is rumored that others are about to follow suit. New novels, not reprints of the successes of a year or two ago, are to be sold at half the former prices, and some of them at less. The first firm to inaugurate this reduction will be Farrar & Rinehart, and their first book to be published at the new price will appear on June 6, on which date the firm will be just one year old. On that date they will publish at $1 "Murder in Paris," a new mystery story by Alice Campbell, author of "Juggernaut" and "Waterweed." New publications will follow at intervals of two weeks. A number of novels, which have already been published at $2, will be reissued at the new price. According to a representative of the publishing firm, the new books will be manufactured in a manner identical with other novels which have been issued at $2. The next firm to put the new prices into effect will be Doubleday, Doran & Co., who will issue on June 20 approximately twenty new novels and detective stories at $1 a copy.

The Doubleday, Doran list is headed by "The Autocracy of Mr. Parham," by H. G. Wells, and includes novels by P. G. Wodehouse, J. S. Fletcher, Edgar Wallace, Margaret Pedler and others. The reduction in prices will not affect the quality in printing, binding, size and workmanship, it is maintained. Lower price levels are promised, too, for very long novels, biographies and other books which have hitherto sold for prices ranging from $3 to $10. A slightly different plan is that of Simon & Schuster, who announce that, beginning with their Summer and Fall publications, virtually their entire fiction list will appear in paper covers at the price of $1. The design and typography of the new volumes have been entrusted to W. A. Dwiggins, the well-known Boston typographer. A plan has been evolved whereby the purchasers of the books will be enabled to send them back to the publishers for more permanent bindings, should they so desire. The Simon & Schuster list of $1 fiction will include new books by Jean-Richard Bloch, Thames Williamson, Felix Salten, J. P. McEvoy and others. Still another reduction, not quite so drastic, is announced by Coward-McCann, who will pubilsh new fiction, printed and bound exactly like $2 and $2.50 novels, at $1.50. The first books to appear at this price will be "Sinners in Summertime," translated from the Norwegian of Sigurd Hoel, and "The Murder of Cecily Thane," a detective story by H. Ashbrook. These will be published on July 18.

In an open letter to Alfred Harcourt of Harcourt, Brace & Co., M. Lincoln Schuster of Simon & Schuster replies to some statements made by Frank K. Notch in his recent book, "King Mob." Mr. Notch accused some publishers, and particularly Simon & Schuster, of promoting the sale of their books by a direct appeal to mass psychology, by "panicking" the public into buying the books. Mr. Schuster denies this most vigorously and accuses Mr. Notch of basing his statements upon guesswork rather than upon facts. Taking Will Durant's "The Story of Philosophy" as an example, as Mr. Notch also did, Mr. Schuster points out that the advance sale of that book was only 768 copies, although 223,692 copies of the $5 edition were subsequently sold, to say nothing of the hundreds of thousand sold still later at $1. The "panic" for "The Story of Philosophy," according to Mr. Schuster, was started by Professor John Dewey and by other readers who enjoyed and respected what they found in the book. After that the publishers, quite naturally, took advantage of the so-called "panic" and helped it along by judicious advertising. And this, again, according to Mr. Schuster, is all that a publisher can do. He admits that he would like to be able to make a book a best seller simply by "turning on the advertising spigot," but he is quite sure that it cannot be done. "King Mob" was reviewed in last Sunday's Times Book Review.

Carl Granville is a new publisher who has established offices at 151 Fifth Avenue, New York City. His first book, just published, is "Hus the Heretic," by "Poggius the Papist." This is the story of John Hus, the Bohemian "arch-heretic," as told by a contemporary prior in letters to a friend. The book was first published in Constance in 1523, but this is its first appearance in English. About June 10 Mr. Granville will bring out in a limited edition "Oscar Wilde Explains" through Hans Heinz Ewers and E. Parin d'Aulaire. This means that the text, in dialogue form, is by Mr. Ewers, accompanied by ten etchings by Edgar Parin d'Aulaire. The edition is limited to 800 copies, of which the first fifty will contain the original etchings, while the others will have reproductions made by a new process.

The price of Stephen Hudson's novel, "A True Story," published by Alfred A. Knopf, is $3, not $3.50, as was stated in the review which appeared in our issue of May 18.

Among the early Fall publications of Henry Holt & Co. will be "A Note in Music," by Rosamond Lehmann, author of "Dusty Answer." Other authors who will appear on the Holt Fall list are Robert Frost, Paul Morand, Howard W. Odum, Walter de la Mare, Laurence Housman, Robert W. Winston, A. J. Villiers, Mary Ellen Chase, Roscoe Pound, F. L. Lucas, Daphne Muir and Lady Charnwood.

Before his sudden death a short time ago, Jefferson Williamson had finished writing a book on the history of American hotels, which Alfred A. Knopf had accepted for publication early in the Fall. The book will be called "The American Hotel: An Anecdotal History." Mr. Williamson was for six years editor of The Hotel Gazette, following many years of newspaper work on The Chicago News, The New York Tribune and The New York Evening Post.

Charles Scribner Jr. has been elected president of the Council of the Princeton University Press to succeed his father, the late head of the publishing house of Charles Scribner's Sons. Curtis W. McGraw, captain of Princeton's championship football team in 1919 and now secretary of the McGraw-Hill Publishing Company, was elected one of the five trustees of the University Press. The trustees reappointed Paul G. Tomlinson as manager of the Press and Frank D. Halsey as assistant manager. Professor Harold W. Dodds, the chairmon of Princeton's new School of Politics and International Affairs, was elected a member of the committee on publication, to serve for a term of five years.

Roger L. Scaife of Houghton Mifflin Company has returned from London after a six weeks' stay, during which he conferred with several of the firm's English authors, including Anne Douglas Sedgwick, Rafael Sabatini, Valentine Williams, E. OE. Somerville, Harold Nicolson, Havelock Ellis, Denis Mackail, John Buchan, Roland Pertwee and Maude Meagher, whose "White Jade" is to be followed soon by a new novel, "Chambers of Imagery." Mr. Scaife concluded publishing arrangements for new books by Ramsay MacDonald, H. A. L. Fisher, Edith and Sacheverell Sitwell and Oliver Onions, and brought back with him the manuscript of John Drinkwater's next volume of poems. He reports that Anne Douglas Sedgwick is writing her next novel, "Philippa," around the character of an American hero, and that Sabatini is at work on a sequel to "Scaramouche."

A limited signed edition of Conrad Aiken's "Selected Poems," which was awarded the 1929 Pulitzer Prize for Poetry, has been issued by Charles Scribner's Sons. REALIZING the historical importance of the Naval Conference in London, Current History devotes a large part of its June number to discussions of the conference and the resulting treaty. Five spokesmen for the countries represented give their views of the results obtained. David Jayne Hill, speaking for the United States, says: "We cannot calculate what naval parity with Great Britain will cost under the treaty of London; it will probably cost less under the treaty than it will without it. But, whatever it costs, this parity must be maintained." H. Wickham Steed, former editor of The London Times, says: "The treaty arouses very moderate enthusiasm in England. It is felt to be a shackled step, not a bold stride in the right direction. It seems a halting advance by nations which, while unanimously declaring peace their supreme goal, yet conceive of peace itself negatively in non-war terms instead of positively as beginning a new, constructive phase of civilization." K. K. Kawakami, Japanese correspondent in Washington, declares that "from the Japanese point of view the London Conference was neither a success nor a failure, but something between the two." Vice Admiral J. Docteur of the French Navy writes: "France does not ask to be protected, but she could not consent to reduce her armaments under pressure from powers which do not wish to give her any guarantee of security." And Carlo Schanzer, an Italian Senator and former Foreign Minister, says that the cause of the failure to bring about a five-power agreement is "not only or principally on account of the insistence of Italy on the principle of naval parity with France, but also—indeed, chiefly—because of France's demand for a crushing naval superiority over Italy." Various phases of the treaty are discussed also by John D. Whitton of the Princeton School of International Studies and by Robert C. Binkley, Professor of History at Smith College.

In its June number, The Thinker begins its promised symposium on Humanism. John Dewey opens the discussion, writing on "What Humanism Means to Me." Before giving his own definition, however, Dr. Dewey describes Humanism as a "portmanteau word" into which "a great many incongruous meanings have been packed." He reviews briefly some of the various meanings that have been given to the word in the past and quotes Walter Pater, who said:

> The essence of Humanism is the belief that nothing which has ever interested living men and women can wholly lose its vitality—no language they have spoken, nor oracle beside which they have hushed their voices, no dreams which have once been entertained by actual human minds, nothing about which they have ever been passionate, or expended time and zeal.

Dr. Dewey adds that this is "far removed from the doctrine of restraint and negation that Paul Elmer More and Irving Babbitt have baptized by the same name." Dr. Dewey concludes his article by stating that Humanism means to him "an expansion, not a contraction, of human life, an expansion in which nature and the science of nature are made the willing servants of human good."

John Haynes Holmes continues the symposium with an article on "Humanism in Religion." He describes Humanism as being neither theism nor atheism, but "the religion of humanity," interpreting religion "in terms not of divine revelation but of human experience."

Jim Tully has been interviewing George Bernard Shaw, and the conversation between the two is reported in the June number of Vanity Fair. Mr. Tully describes Mr. Shaw as "the wittiest man in the world," which may be true enough, although there is nothing in the interview to support the statement. Mr. Shaw was, however, kind enough to laugh at one or two of Mr. Tully's jokes, and that always makes a good impression. The leading article in this issue of Vanity Fair is "Uncorking the Constitution," by Jay Franklin. This is a triumphant account of the wave of anti-prohibition sentiment which now appears to be sweeping the country. Another "wet" article is Corey Ford's "The Doubters of the American Revolution," his second contribution in support of Vanity Fair's Anti-Speakeasy League, which proposes to abolish the speakeasy by repealing the Eighteenth Amendment, just as the Anti-Saloon League abolished the saloon by causing the amendment to be adopted. A number of prominent Americans have been invited to join the league, and some of them have replied, among them Senator Brookhart, who writes that if he ever joins such an organization it will be with a search warrant.

When you hear a cricket chirping merrily on your hearth or elsewhere you may know that it is a bachelor cricket serenading his lady love. The cricket does not chirp after he has acquired a mate—and for a very good reason: his wife won't let him. "The minute she becomes a wife she rends her husband's wings and breaks his fiddle, so as to put him definitely out of the running." At any rate, that is what Royal Dixon tells us in the American Magazine for June. His article is entitled "The Private Life of the Insects," and it is full of interesting information about the habits of ants, bees, locusts and other small creatures. He describes the agricultural and dairying pursuits of various species of ants, telling, for example, how he watched a colony of ants harvest a crop of rice. He tells of spinster ants and bees who act as nurses for the young of their species. But insects have their faults, too. Mr. Dixon tells of a swarm of bees discovering a cask of wine which had broken open. They immediately proceeded to get disgracefully drunk, guzzling and guzzling until they could no longer move their legs or wings, just like pre-Volstead humans.

The Rotarian for May appears in new typographical dress, presenting a greatly improved appearance. The opening article in this issue is "Will I Be Safe in Chicago?" by Floyd L. Bateman. It is addressed to Rotarians who may be hesitating as to the advisability of attending the Silver Anniversary Convention in that city beginning on June 23. While admitting that there are criminals in Chicago and that these do sometimes indulge in shooting, Mr. Bateman insists that "the average of such experience is actually less in Chicago than in many other cities." In another article, "Chicago—Rotary's Host in June," H. F. Harrington tells of the plans Chicago has made for the entertainment of its Rotarian visitors from all parts of the world.

exploration, for the great Barrier and the sea whose glacial shores have been the base of expeditions in the twentieth century bear his name. The huge volcanic mountains that look down upon the sea are known by the names of his ships, Erebus and Terror. The claims of Wilkes to new land were cavalierly rejected by Ross, but Dr. Mawson, leading the Australian Antarctic expedition, who is a discriminating critic, has placed land on his chart that he believes was seen by Wilkes. The American Geographical Society gives Wilkes credit for outlining "the phenomena of a continental margin for a distance of 1,800 miles." There is glory enough for all. Adelie Land, which Mawson in part explored, was undoubtedly the discovery of Captain d'Urville of the French Navy.

Having given an admirable description of "The Last Continent of Adventure" and done justice to early adventurers, Mr. Hayward takes up in turn the work of Scott, Shackleton, Amundsen, Mawson, Byrd and Wilkins in the twentieth century. Those who have read the two-volume narratives of these explorers crowded with details will testify to the accuracy and impartiality of Mr. Hayward's condensation. Nowhere is a dull paragraph. It is true that he has tragedy as well as comedy to deal with, and legitimate thrills are never wanting. Nothing of sentiment, of salient character, of beauty of the glacier and skyscape is lost in the author's story. The killer whales, seals, the sea lions and elephants are alive, and the quaint penguins are always a source of entertainment. The author acknowledges his indebtedness to Hayes's "Antarctica," a monumental work. Justice is done to Scott's first expedition with the Discovery, which was really a pioneer effort and drew from Sir Clements Markham the tribute: "Never has any polar expedition returned with so great a harvest of results."

Of Sir Ernest Shackleton the author says that had he lived "in the days of Queen Elizabeth he might easily have shone in that famous company of mariners who laid the foundation of Britain's far-flung empire, for the sea was his highway, the unknown his loadstone." Shackleton took the discovery expedition as his model, "although he introduced innovations." He was wrong in his doubt of the value of dog transport, and the use of ponies and motor transportation was a blunder. Yet, in spite of handicaps, Shackleton in 1908 fought his way to within ninety-seven miles of the South Pole. With more rations he would have anticipated Amundsen. For both Scott (in his second discovery expedition) and Shackleton the Beardmore Glacier was a stupendous obstacle. Had Scott been able to make his base on the ice of the Bay of Whales, which he planned to do—he was frustrated by ice conditions—he would undoubtedly have reached the Pole by the same route later taken by Amundsen. No one admired Shackleton more than the Norwegian did. His tribute to the gallant attempt made by the Irishman was genuinely enthusiastic. Amundsen's conquest of the Pole, of course, lends itself to dramatic and picturesque treatment. A moving account of it is given. Amundsen is evidently a hero to the author. "The Tragedy of the Barrier" is the title given to the lamentable result of Scott's second expedition. "Amid the solitudes of the Ross Ice Barrier, many miles from land, is a lonely grave—perhaps the loneliest grave in all the world." Inadequate dog traction was the cause of the loss of Scott and his splendid little company of men who died with him. With such a supply of dogs as Amundsen had there would have been no question of failing rations and fuel. Scott's diary will be immortal. Liberal quotations are made from it. There is this summing up: "Scott, lying in a cairn on the Barrier, had in death the power to stir the heart of man."

At the head of the Mawson chapter is the dreadful saying of the Anglo-Australian explorers: "We had found an accursed country." More tragedy: men perishing on the "trail" and Mawson staggering back to his base, saved by a great brain and a stout heart. Hayes is quoted: "If Ross discovered his Barrier, Mawson discovered the Shackleton Shelf, scarcely less impressive." Dr. Mawson has been the most competent scientist of all the Antarctic explorers. Again Shackleton comes into the picture in his expedition to cross the continent from Weddell Sea to Ross Sea by way of the Pole. But the Endurance was crushed in the ice. For many weary days the crew camped on floes until at last Elephant Island was gained. There was the voyage of the ship's boat James Caird over a wilderness of stormy waters for hundreds of miles to South Georgia and the crossing of its mountain chain for help. Rescue came after several ships had failed to break through the pack to Elephant Island. What a story of adventure and how well it is told!

"Byrd's American Invasion" and the flying expeditions of Sir Hubert Wilkins, with which the book closes, are still fresh in the public mind. "Byrd left Antarctica laden with honors." He is returning to receive the homage of his delighted countrymen. To all who find adventure and discovery the best of reading Mr. Hayward's well written and timely book may be commended as an example of what such narrative should be.

THE SUN GOD'S CHILDREN. By James Willard Schulz and Jessie Louise Donaldson. With portraits by Winold Reiss. 255 pp. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

By NICHOLAS ROOSEVELT

TO the new literature of "the noble red man" must be added this book about the Blackfeet by lifelong friends of the tribe. Written particularly in response to the interest of tourists who visit the Glacier National Park and its Canadian counterpart, the Waterton Lakes National Park, it is a curious compound of dry ethnological and sociological information and stirring tales of personal adventure. Like Frank Linderman's "American," its purpose is to preserve the memory of the old days of the Indians.

The task which the authors set themselves was a hard one. They felt, apparently, that as the volume was a sort of guide book or compendium of information it must be all-embracing. As a result, they have reprinted extracts from journals of early explorers. They describe the origin and nature of various religious ceremonies. Finally, they detail the adventures of individual chiefs as young men.

Perhaps this mixture is what their public will want. But it falls between a truly "popular" work and a scientific treatise. Interesting as are the accounts of the early explorations and ceremonies, these seem to lack an air of authority. At the same time, they are too replete with details to be readily readable.

It results, therefore, that only the last third of the book has a wide appeal. This contains the stories of the old chiefs—stories put into simple English, translated apparently much as they were told to the writers. As in "American," the stories are of youthful adventures of war, horse stealing and personal privations. Good tales, they are, too, exciting, and at the same time reflecting the life of the Blackfeet before the white men came in to occupy their lands and enforce peace.

No wonder the old-timers look upon the new order as heavy handed. Gone are the days of buffalo hunts. Worse, still, gone are the days when an enemy was fair game, and when even boys in their 'teens took part in horse-raiding expeditions in which they were prepared to kill so as not themselves to be killed. Life is tame now that a ponderous justice settles quarrels without bloodshed and that manhunting is taboo.

So, for example, Chief Weasel Tail in reminiscing of his youth gives a series of hair-raising escapes and adventures in which he succeeded in "counting coup" on his enemies. Horse stealing furnished almost as much excitement as war—stealing the enemies' horses, which was a favorite pastime. There was an element of sportsmanship about it, too, and the ideal was to steal the best horses rather than mere "plugs." On one of these expeditions Weasel Tail and his comrades came on a band of Crows too large to fight. So they hid near the Crow camp till night and then sallied forth to take the "buffalo horses" which were the fastest and most cherished and so were tethered near the tents of the owners.

It is very dangerous, that taking of horses out of an enemy camp. Each time we went in for them we went well knowing that we might not come out alive. At any time we were likely to be discovered and shot down. The second time we went in, as we were approaching the lodge to which two big gray horses were tied, their ropes secured to the pegs of the lodge skin, we heard a deep, heavy cough within it, and stopped and lay down flat at the edge of a not high growth of sagebrush. And just in time, for a man came out of the lodge, stood staring this way and that way, went to the two horses, examined their ropes and then went back into the lodge. We lay right where we were for some time, then went to another part of the camp; heard heavy snoring in a lodge near which three horses were tied; we took them.

Once out of the camp it was necessary to make a quick getaway, as the Crows would find the trail and follow it. But by changing horses and riding hard it was possible to make the most of the lead and so escape without further adventure.

Through these stories runs a strong belief in the supernatural, and in dreams and spirits good and bad. The man who possessed "good medicine"—cynics would describe him as being lucky and "throwing a good bluff"—was looked up to by his fellows. In fairness to these leaders it must be admitted that their belief in themselves and their gods was great, and that it fortified them to many a deed of rare courage. Nor did the leaders shirk responsibility. They took upon themselves to prevent foolish escapades by foolhardy youngsters, to advise on methods of attack, to plan and lead expeditions where their word meant life or death for their followers. They may have had their moments of faltering in the face of the danger, but never let on and never deserted their comrades in emergencies. Primitive standards, perhaps, but not without qualities of nobility.

As in "American," the religious and moral note is strong. In fact, the Indians' reliance on the Great Spirit—the Blackfeet happened to worship the sun—is evident at every turn. At the same time, the rigor of the training through which their children were put developed to the utmost such traits of character as fortitude, self-control and courage. Theirs was a hard life, but one which demanded the utmost of the human character. In fact, their white conquerors seem soft and godless in comparison.

Not the least merit of this book are the drawings by Winold Reiss. Following the example of E. A. Burbank, who was one of the first to make uncolored crayon portraits of Indian heads, Mr. Reiss has made studies of individual chiefs that exemplify the Burbank method at its best. This field is as yet but little touched. Its possibilities are evident by a glance at Mr. Reiss's drawings.

The Twentieth Century Revolt Against Dualism

Professor Lovejoy's Survey of the Movement Becomes a Rebellion Against It

THE REVOLT AGAINST DUALISM. An Inquiry Concerning the Existence of Ideas. By Arthur O. Lovejoy. 325 pp. New York: W. W. Norton. $4.

By AXTON CLARK

IN "The Revolt Against Dualism," Dr. A. O. Lovejoy, Professor of Philosophy in the Johns Hopkins University, has achieved a monumental volume. It augments the rank of outstanding contemporary contributions in the philosophical field.

The topic of Dualism is one of considerable present interest. The whole Neo-Humanist controversy, which in the realm of intellectual fads has apparently become the successor to Freudism or Behaviorism, has centred attention on the problem of the differentiation between the natural world and the world of mind. But so much that has of late been poured out along these lines suffers from dilettantism and primitivism that Dr. Lovejoy's acute discussion comes like a healthy north wind dispersing intellectual clouds.

Not that "The Revolt Against Dualism" is a contribution to the literature of Neo-Humanism. It is concerned with the elucidation of the fundamentals of the mind-matter problem which both the pros and the antis in the Humanist fracas for the most part so nimbly neglect. More than that, Dr. Lovejoy has limited himself to two questions, the vicissitudes of which in recent thought he follows through with care, comprehensiveness and accuracy. The book accordingly stands as the antithesis of amateurish or slipshod thinking.

"The last quarter-century, it may confidently be predicted," says Dr. Lovejoy," will have for future historians of philosophy a distinctive interest and instructiveness as the Age of the Great Revolt against Dualism." It is to the history, scrutiny and evaluation of this rebellion in favor of some sort of Monism—the doctrine that the universe is single rather than dual in its ultimate nature—that the volume is devoted.

Engagingly enough, the author's own intention and conclusions are dualistic, yet this never interferes with the accuracy of his analysis and the dispassionateness with which arguments are tested, and accepted or rejected. Though the title "The Revolt Against Dualism" indicates the main historico-critical content of the book, it might in a more profound sense have been called "A Revolt Against Monism."

This kind of dispassionateness, pressing forward toward definite conclusions, yet always considering the rights and validities of opposing viewpoints, is one of the crowning glories of both philosophy and science. Where it is absent, one has every reason to suspect one is dealing with pseudo-philosophy or pseudo-science. The social character of intellectual inquiry, the precautions and the tentative hypotheses, the reservations and qualifications in conclusion, which tend to irk any one impatiently leaping to immature results rather than attempting to fit his thought adequately to the rich and awesome nature of reality—all these have rarely been given so classically clear a statement as this one to be found in Dr. Lovejoy's preface:

> Philosophy seems to me essentially a collective and cooperative business. Effective cooperation among philosophers consists, it is true, primarily in disagreement. For, given a sufficiently well defined problem, philosophy can really get forward with it only by bringing together in their logical inter-connection all the considerations which have occurred, or are likely to occur, to acute and philosophically initiated minds as significantly pertinent to that problem. These considerations will always be numerous, they will always, during the progress of any philosophical inquiry, be conflicting, and they must be contributed by many minds of diverse types and different training and preconceptions. But no typical and, so to say, normal consideration can with safety be left unconsidered, if the philosopher's distinctive but difficult duty of logical circumspection is to be observed, and if the joint inquiry is to be brought to a critically reasoned and convincing result—a result which may fairly objectively be said to be more probable than any alternative, at least in the light of the existing state of empirical knowledge, and of the relevant reflections which have thus far presented themselves to the human mind. The true procedure of philosophy as a science—as distinct from the philosophic idiosyncrasies of individuals—is thus that of a Platonic dialogue on a grand scale, in which the theses, proposed proofs, objections, rejoinders, of numerous interlocutors are focused upon a given question, and the argument gradually shapes itself* * * to a conclusion.

Yet this dispassionateness in no way detracts from the vividness of the drama with which "The Revolt Against Dualism" is concerned. It rather sets it off and enhances the opposing forces and their interactions by showing them as much as possible in their power and their weakness, rising and sinking, destroying and establishing, overcoming and affirming.

Two things tend to obscure the actual nature of philosophy from the general reader, and both in a manner are paradoxes. The first is the apparent abstractness of careful thought: yet once the initial effort of grasping thoroughly defined conceptions is made, these prove to be as definite, manageable constituents of the world as any tree or dynamo. The second is the extraordinary difficulty of seeing reality as it is, even in its most common and habitual forms.

It is, to give an illustration, perhaps not familiar to the general reader that in normal vision objects lose their green and red hues as they move from the point of the central focus of sight toward the side, and that just before an object passes out of the field of vision it entirely ceases to have color and is seen in black and white or grey. This phenomenon is happening, whenever their eyes are open in daylight, to all persons not blind or color-blind. Yet we are so used to thinking everything we see is always seen with the characteristics of what is full in the focus of eyesight that it is difficult to discern these alterations of hue unless an object whose color is unknown to the person seeing is brought into his field of vision from the side; whereupon he will discover to his surprise that he cannot see the color of the object until it is well along toward the centre of his focus of sight, and that he will be able to identify the hue of something blue or yellow further to the side than he can make out something green or red

The former of these obstacles has to be overcome before the true quality of Dr. Lovejoy's "Revolt Against Dualism" emerges. For the volume presents the drama of a campaign and strategy lying in the realm of thought. And the latter of the above points enters to give zest and mystery to the situation. For the opposing campaigners are not seeking to fight each other down. They all, including the author and historian, are trying to follow the surprisingly arduous path of seeing the world for what it is, of penetrating to the final character of a universe whose surface is not recalcitrant to the manipulations of agriculture, industry, commerce, and whose depths yield themselves symbolically to the faith of the religious mystic.

The fundamental problems involved in the campaign concern the differentiation of the world into a physical and a mental level, a world of matter and a world of ideas, as well as the distinction between our thoughts and the things which our thoughts are about, and the question as to the extent to which our thoughts present, represent, symbolize, mediate their objects. It is in this double sense that the volume bears the sub-title, "An Inquiry Concerning the Existence of Ideas."

The thinkers of the seventeenth century, particularly Descartes, established a dualistic position in basic matters; and it is against this tradition that the modern revolt has been made. A passion for unity and simplicity has sought to reduce all qualities of existence, physical and mental, to one level, and has wished to reach reality directly, without the interposition of subjective ideas.

So Dr. Lovejoy's story of the struggle starts with a notably clear account of "Cartesian Dualism and Natural Dualism," which merges into the story of the rebellion. "It was the bold raising of the standard of revolt by William James in his famous essay "Does Consciousness Exist?" twenty-six years ago, and by G. E. Moore in his "Refutation of Idealism," a year earlier, that gave the revolutionary movement its first great impetus in America and Great Britain respectively.* * *" Gradually we follow through "The First Phase of the Revolt and Its Outcome"—which was virtual collapse.

"The Second Phase" is conditioned by the resurgence of certain nineteenth century doctrines and by the "supposed implications" of the new physics, especially of parts of the theory of relativity. The doctrines involved in this phase of the revolt come under the head of "Objective Relativism." In "The Outcome of the Second Phase" they are given a careful scrutiny which leads to a brace of masterly studies of individual thinkers, "Mr. Whitehead and the Denial of Simple Location" and "Mr. Bertrand Russell and the Unification of Mind and Matter."

This is followed by a direct discussion of "Dualism and the Physical World," and the volume closes with "The Nature of Knowing as a Natural Event" which offers the final grounds for Dr. Lovejoy's resolutely dualistic answer to both his fundamental questions—that is, for his revolt against the revolt.

Throughout, in spite of the fact that the author is tending toward definite conclusions, his method of approach is not the surging synthesis of speculation used by Whitehead in his recent "Process and Reality," nor that of a step by step determination of empirical premises, but of the following through of alternative hypotheses to their logical conclusions. And it is this which gives one the crystalline sense of intellectual drama, once one has penetrated and come to grips with the subject matter and its lordly series of attempts to wrest understanding from a bafflingly secretive reality—not the reality of mere abstract thought, but concrete reality, living, moving, existing in and around us.

This is no place for a technical appraisal of Dr. Lovejoy's points. One can only say that, whatever one's agreements or disagreements, the book remarkably combines transparent articulateness with subtle argumentation. "The Revolt Against Dualism" is a consummately able exposition and criticism of the implication concerning the status of mind and ideas to be drawn from the most important recent philosophical and physical doctrines.

A History of Cooperative News-Gathering

HISTORY OF COOPERATIVE NEWS-GATHERING IN THE UNITED STATES. By Victor Rosewater. 379 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $3.50.

By ALLEN SINCLAIR WILL

THE cooperative gathering of news by The Associated Press, The United Press and other agencies, one of the most striking examples of effective organization on a large scale which America has contributed to world experience, is the result of a long process of development which deserves historical treatment. Much light on the struggles of early and rudimentary news organizations against physical obstacles, and their perhaps even more strenuous struggles with each other, is to be found in the memoirs of Melville E. Stone and in some of the more recently published histories of journalism. But the subject is worthy of well-knit and complete consideration in a balanced narrative, which is given in the present volume by Victor Rosewater, formerly editor of The Omaha Bee.

Mr. Rosewater's competency to undertake the task will not be disputed. His membership representation for more than twenty-five years in the old Associated Press of Illinois and its successor, The Associated Press of New York, gave him a first-hand view of the operation of news collecting as practiced by them and, perhaps, more valuable still for his purpose, personal contact with the big men who brought the system to its present state. He has also had access to original papers preserved by his father, who was first an old-time telegrapher and later an influential editor.

Even had Mr. Rosewater come in the guise of a special pleader for one news organization or another in a field where rivalries have been intense, his contribution would have been valuable, doubtless, as giving new light. It is much more valuable because he falls into the objective rôle of the newspaper commentator which is natural to him, bestowing his space and his judgments with an impartial hand on each important unit in the group from the days of Samuel Topliff's coffee house distribution of news in Boston to the latest accessions, including the Consolidated Press Association and the Jewish Telegraphic Agency. He has emphasized further his viewpoint as a historian by linking the development of combinations for news-gathering with the progress of the means of communication upon which they have been dependent. He writes:

> Passing in review the successive advances from rowboat to radio, no one can fail to realize what a tremendous leap has been taken in the realm of news-gathering. How little of the future may be foreseen at any moment is well illustrated by the fact that in his history of the telegraph, Dr. Alexander Jones, the first general agent of the first Associated Press, insisted that the only hope of carrying foreign news across the ocean by electric current rested in the construction of a transcontinental line that would cross Bering Strait and enter the Siberian back door. And this Alaskan telegraph was being actively promoted up to the very instant of final success with the Atlantic cable.

In turn Mr. Rosewater treats of the gathering of news for merchants' exchanges in the early part of the nineteenth century, the combinations for collecting marine news, the "pony expresses" which preceded the telegraph, the orderly arrangement of transmission by means of the Morse system to attain something like stability and dependability, the solution of problems of Civil War news and the rise of greater news organisms of general scope which followed that war.

All of the difficulties encountered at successive stages of this progress were more complicated here than in European countries because of the size of the territory to be covered and the differing situations in regions remote from each other.

The most interesting and at the same time most important pages of the narrative are those concerned with the prolonged conflict in the '90s of the last century between the old Associated Press, with its subordinate, allied or harmonious organizations designated as "New York," "Western," "Illinois," "Southern," &c., and the old United Press, to which the present United Press has no relation. This strife, led on the respective sides by daring and able men, including Stone and Walter P. Phillips, backed by publishers possessing large resources, was wasteful and sometimes destructive.

Out of this welter The Associated Press emerged victorious, though not without its wounds, and became the non-profit organization which it is today, intrenched in its legal rights but facing new competition from the present United Press, the International News Service and a growing number of other agencies and feature syndicates, which has spurred it, and them as well, to redoubled vigor.

In all the competition, it is fortunate that the public interest, which is, of course, paramount as to news collection, has suffered little, if any. It would seem that Jefferson's view of the necessity of newspapers in a democratic government, as furnishing the raw materials for reflection and opinion, has been borne out by the general recognition that truth and fairness were the bedrocks upon which alone enduring prosperity for news organizations could be built. There have been and are lapses in practice but most observers will be disposed to agree that the general character of the cooperative news agencies in the United States was never as high as it is now.

It is the belief of Mr. Rosewater that the present competition is likely to be lessened in the future by some method which will reduce the increasing duplication of effort. He writes:

> Complete merger seems hardly practicable, were it desirable, which is not conceded, but it is not difficult to believe that the movement to eliminate waste in newspaper-making will effectuate, eventually, a much closer union of the news-gathering alliances. With an earnest purpose, coupled with a discontinuance of mutual suspicion, a working accord would materialize. Whether this be proximate or remote, the service grows more and more essential to the modern daily newspaper, its scope more and more varied, its tendency toward standardization more pronounced, its force for informing and thus directing public opinion more potent.

Mr. Rosewater has performed more than a service for the group embraced in the general title of the American press. His service is equally to the constantly growing body of readers who are taking an interest in newspaper production and the life that goes with it as an institution of the times, worthy of observation on the ground of intrinsic interest as well as for the special importance in a republic of the functions of newspapers.

On the Big Game Trail In Central Africa

Four Travelers Come Out of the Bush With Tales of Their Adventures

JUNGLE PORTRAITS. By Delia J. Akeley. Illustrated with original photographs. 251 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

By GREGORY MASON

THE first two books listed above are by big game hunters. Both Mr. Cudahy and Mrs. Cron see Africa as an adventure. They "do" Africa as one might "do" Chinatown, or a parachute leap. They are primarily interested in their own emotions and as travel records. Therefore, their writings are less interesting than those of Mr. Campbell and Mrs. Akeley, who are too busy observing what is going on in the minds of natives and animals and insects to count their own heartbeats and goose pimples.

Big game hunting, which is rapidly devastating the bush and veldt of Africa, is sufficiently condemned, as a matter of fact, in Mrs. Cron's own account of how her husband shot his first elephant:

> There lay a body which had taken perhaps a hundred years or more to be built up to its present splendor. How suddenly it had passed from life into death! I think I experienced the sensations that attack even the veteran hunter in spite of the fact that he has brought satisfactorily to an ending the supreme adventure the African wilderness has to offer.

Now, as a matter of fact, Mrs. Cron had a much more "supreme adventure" when her husband and brother came down with severe attacks of malaria, their lives being saved by her energy and foresight in getting them out of the bush in the nick of time and by her courage and devotion in nursing them afterward when she herself was running a temperature.

The truth about this big game hunting is reflected in Mrs. Akeley's pertinent sympathy for the "poor, persecuted lion," in Mr. Campbell's condemnation of slaughtering animals with high-powered rifles except for purposes of "feeding hungry natives in famine time" and in his commendation of the sportsmanship of the Arabs who hunt the elephant and rhinoceros from horseback with lances. He himself used this primitive arm against the buffalo, considered by many authorities the most dangerous beast in Africa. Most Americans who stay at home and try to guard the natural resources of their own country will applaud Mrs. Akeley's statement that "the natives of Africa have a better right to the game than the white man * * * who hunts for the sheer joy of killing. Like the much maligned lion, the native kills only when he is hungry, and then only enough to satisfy his needs and the needs of his family."

It is only fair to Mr. Cudahy and Mrs. Cron to add that they did as much hunting with the camera as with the rifle, and apparently with better success. The former's photographs of wild animals are good, the latter's remarkably good. Mrs. Cron writes in a pleasant, straightforward style; Mr. Cudahy has a six cylinder sense of humor that must be a great asset in the bush and a knack for seeing things vividly that is invaluable in writing about it all afterward. Mr. Rountree's drawings for "African Horizons" look as if they belong and were not just tacked on.

To most of us, people are more interesting than animals. And that is one reason why it is so satisfactory to travel with Mr. Campbell and Mrs. Akeley. They seem to know the natives, even to the variations in the way different tribes smell.

> The Bantu black is the true prototype and unspoiled counterpart of the American Negro [says Mr. Campbell.] He is a real song-bird, whose melodies range the whole gamut of human life. Without music the African can neither live nor die, nor can he be buried. To the accompaniment of an old biscuit-tin or a couple of sticks, the gunwale of the canoe, or the leaves of the forest, any or all can be made to give forth a series of barbaric sounds which will set in motion not only the Negro's voice, but his feet and every bit of his body.

Speaking of the natives in general, Mrs. Akeley says that

> The wistful and plaintive note that appeals to us so much in the "spiritual" is lacking in Africa. These people of the desert and jungle are not longing for any sweet chariot to swing low. Neither are they indulging in jazz or the blues. They are filled with a simple, free joy that is the hardest emotion for us to understand or feel.

Mr. Campbell spent a good deal of time among cannibals, who still exist near the Nile-Congo Divide, in the inner regions of the Gaboons and Cameroons, parts of Southern and Northern Nigeria and in the Niger delta. He points out that in much of Africa where a chicken is a chicken and a goat is a goat a human being is "meat." Fascinating are his stories of feasts of "black beef" or "baby beef," of people who eat their dead friends and relatives in order to assimilate their virtues, of Bakasanshi ghouls who dig up and eat bodies and run about howling like hyenas. Although he reports tourist travel becoming increasingly easy in Africa he believes it will be many centuries before the primitive heart of the people of the interior will be tamed, if ever. He finds Islam making no headway in Central Africa, finds the natives under French and British rule reasonably satisfied in the more remote districts, but reports that in such white man's settlements as Capetown the hard and fast drawing of the color line is working grave injustice and inflicting a wound which will be "beyond all remedy" unless the British soon admit his contention that "British justice should be color blind."

Mrs. Akeley does not confine herself within the usual lion-rhino-elephant complex of the big game hunter, albeit she knows these creatures much better than he ever will. Her visit to Lake Hannington to hunt flamingoes with the camera is alone worth the price of the book. She finds the study of the crocodile "more enlightening and fascinating" than bombarding "the poor, persecuted lion," and she herself, whether with her late husband, Carl Akeley, or whether all alone in the bush with her faithful black boys, has the patience and determination of the real student. Thus she saw what no one else has ever seen, a crocodile kill a great turtle by spinning the amphibian through the air to crack its shell against a rock. And she saw enough of the big saurians to feel justified in leaning toward the conclusion that they normally kill their prey with their teeth, never first stunning it with their muscular tails, as some naturalists and hunters have been inclined to believe.

Her studies of the pigmies (who come into the world, by the way, as large as the babies of normal people) have a distinct scientific value which does not prevent her writing about them in a terse dramatic style that will hold any reader. Her story of how, unattended by any white companion, she joined the pigmies in a hunt for a wounded elephant is a masterpiece. The pigmies had only primitive weapons, and it was a long, wearisome struggle before the great tusker died from the wounds inflicted by poisoned spears. Then, > when the pigmies had gorged to the limit of their capacity they crawled inside the body of the elephant and went to sleep. Terrified at being left alone, I threw sticks into the air so they would fall upon the elephant's side and keep them awake. When this ruse failed, I screamed and pretended I was a leopard. This brought them to the fireside with their spears in their hands, and there they remained until the welcome daylight appeared.

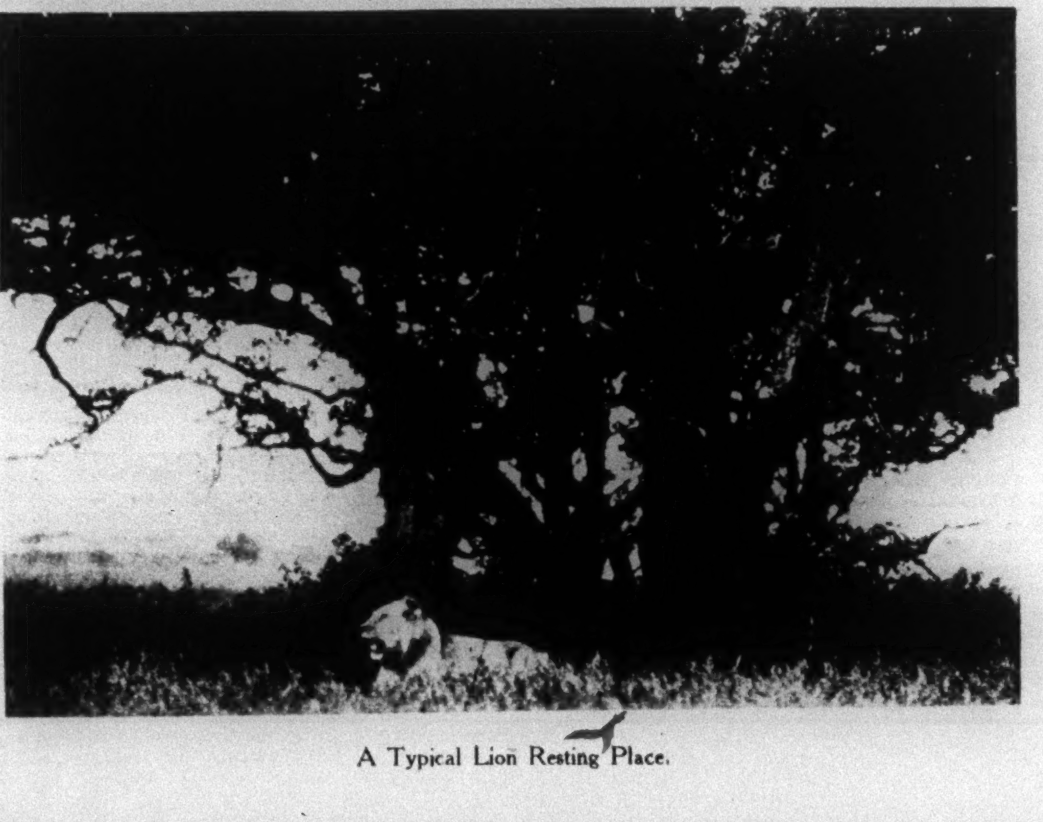
The Problem of Mexican Immigration

MEXICAN IMMIGRATION TO THE UNITED STATES. A Study of Human Migration and Adjustment. By Manuel Gamio. 262 pp. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. $3.

MEXICAN immigration has assumed such proportions in recent years that it has attracted the anxious attention of both governments and aroused the opposition of labor in this country. But the problem has arisen so recently and has grown so rapidly that it has had very little exact and informed study. Mr. Gamio's account of the results of the year's investigation he has given it under the auspices of the Social Science Research Council comes therefore at a timely moment and carries the importance which, in addition to its able character, the need for it gives. Mr. Gamio, a Mexican born and bred, who has done much post-graduate study at Columbia and has since been a member of the faculty of the University of Mexico, and is now Magistrate of the Supreme Council of Defense and Social Prevention of that country, brought to his task knowledge of conditions in both countries and sympathetic understanding of the social forces and economic needs involved. Although considerably handicapped by the difficulty, sometimes the impossibility, of getting in Mexico much of the material he desired, he has made a strikingly broad and inclusive investigation that throws light on many phases of the immigration not usually considered in such researches. His report is a very human document. It pays attention not only to the numbers affected and the economic factors involved, but considers also the cultural backgrounds of the immigrants in the regions of Mexico, whence they came, the effect which their sojourn in the United States has upon them, their mental development, their religion, their reaction to the new conditions under which they live while in this country and other matters.

Mr. Gamio has done his best to collect dependable statistics as to the extent of the immigration from Mexico, but has found that there is a difference of almost half a million between Mexican and American figures. His conclusion is that unchecked permanent immigration is undesirable for both countries, notwithstanding the demand for Mexican labor in the Southwest, but that transient immigration, flowing back and forth between the two, will benefit both. His survey of the whole question is rich in varied information and makes a welcome addition to the heretofore meager literature on this subject.



A Typical Lion Resting Place.

Notes on Rare Books

WHEN in our national pride we celebrate the discovery of America, we never stop to think of all the trouble Columbus caused the early sixteenth century map-makers. Earnest fellows all, anxious to arrive at the truth about this globe and its geography, they were most unworldly men and quite easily misled. Working in the dark for the most part, with vague conjecture to guide them and a dependence upon Ptolemy and garbled versions of Marco Polo's account, they were building up strange conceptions of the unexplored regions of the earth. A little thing like Columbus's discoveries and his belief that they were some part of Eastern Asia, was enough to throw their unstable edifice still further out of plumb and to delay the progress of geography some seventy years. It is time one pitied the lowly cartographer. But at least one of them, Waldseemüller, managed to retaliate, however inadvertently. By assigning to the new lands the name of Amerigo Vespucci, he robbed Columbus of no small measure of his glory. It was not until 1566 that the confusion created by Columbus was dissolved and the separation of Asia and America became complete. In that year one Bolognino Zaltieri, a Venetian printer of maps, issued what purported to be his map of North America, showing for the first time, so far as we know, the Strait of Anian dividing the two continents.

The whole history of this idea of a waterway separating Asia and America, its antecedents, the source of the theory and the responsibility for its promulgation, are discussed in detail in Dr. George E. Nunn's privately printed "Origin of the Strait of Anian Concept." The edition is limited to 200 copies, for sale at $2 each by George H. Beans, Box 251, Glenside, Pa., a well-known collector of seventeenth century maps of America printed in Italy. He owns the copy of the Zaltieri map reproduced as a frontispiece. It is without date or imprint and it bears every indication of being a very early impression. Apart from its historical value the map repays study for what it reveals of the crude notion of America held by cartographers of the period. The most obvious distortion is that of Labrador, which has a dangerous bias in the direction of Greenland. Whatever was most familiar at the time is prominently displayed and labeled, such as the Azores, the Canary and Cape Verde islands. There is a sort of constricted Gulf of Mexico, but it will serve. As a matter of fact, it is in our impression the best clue we have to the map's identity, the chief indication that this would be North America.

DR. NUNN covers considerable ground in his splendid little volume, in fact, he covers the whole earth. That might not have been such a tremendous feat for the cartographical acrobats of the early 1500's. But to unravel their errors of fact and fancy is no mean task. Dr. Nunn is already familiar to us for the admirable handling of his theme in the "Roselli Oval World Map." Here again he has acquitted himself extremely well and produced another useful work of first-rate quality. His text is enriched with innumerable references to authorities consulted and some of the maps described are reproduced. The subject is esoteric and difficult, the details in the main abstruse, but its importance for showing the development of ideas about the New World and the problems that beset the early explorers, their uncertainty and dark guesses, make it worthy of our attention. We shall consider briefly the various aspects of the problem in the order taken by Dr. Nunn and record some of the outstanding features of his essay.

The first part of the book is devoted to a study of the beginnings of the idea of the separation of Asia and America. The conception had its origin in the blending of the two kinds of accounts, those of Asiatic and those of American explorations. Marco Polo's regions were represented on the map as adding 60 degrees of mainland to Ptolemy's 180 degrees of the known world. The island of Zipango (Japan) added 30 degrees more to the Far East, making the total extent of the known world 270 degrees from the prime meridian through the Canary Islands. This combination of Ptolemy and Marco Polo is best known through the Behaim globe of 1492. When Columbus on his first voyage failed to find Zipango at the estimated distance, he was threatened with mutiny by his crew. When later he found Cuba some 1,100 leagues from the Canaries, he sought Zipango further east, and in this way identified Esnañola as Zipango. Acceptance of Columbus's claims meant the rejection of Ptolemy's degree value and gave rise to eight types of early sixteenth century maps, which Dr. Nunn has classified. Until after Magellan's voyage most mapmakers preferred the Waldseemüller type. But his 1507 map was the one that caused the greatest confusion by representing both Ptolemaic and Columbian ideas and showing America as somehow a part of Asia.

AFTER Columbus's fourth voyage the search continued for twenty years for a strait he had expected to find between the New World and the mainland of Asia. But before 1530 the idea of a strait leading into the South Sea was generally abandoned until after 1550, when it took another form in the search for a northwest passage. Magellan's voyage was held by Johann Schöner to prove that South America was a peninsula from the mainland of Asia. The Schöner maps almost displaced all other conceptions of world geography between 1523 and 1560. Then came the modification of the map due to the explorations north of Mexico in search of the wealth of Cathay. There were Narvaez, Cabeca de Vaca, De Soto, Alarcon, Cabrillo and Coronado. Cartographers had to remove Cathay and other Asiatic countries and cities from Mexico and New Spain.

MEANWHILE Zipango, having been discovered by three Portuguese sailors, began to reappear on maps as an entity separate from Española. Oviedo expressed his belief in 1546 that America was no part of Asia. Sir Humphrey Gilbert noted the absence of the fauna of Asia in America, a fact of very great significance in advancing the idea that the two continents were not joined. Cabot's attempt to find a northeast passage around the north of Europe to China was necessarily based upon the same theory. But it was twenty years more before the search turned in the other direction in quest of a northwest passage. It was from the Gastaldi School of Cartography, if not from Gastaldi himself, that we have the first map known to us showing the Strait of Anian. The conception belongs to a period of transition in geographical ideas. At the same time the practice was common among cartographers to reprint earlier maps in slightly rehabilitated form for a long time after the period for which they were intended. Marinelli offers a hypothesis, which Dr. Nunn is inclined to accept, to account for the responsibility for the conception of the strait. Gastaldi was the real "inventor"; Gastaldi also made a world map showing the strait in 1562, but no copy of that map is known to exist; Zaltieri's map is a copy of a portion of this lost Gastaldi map.

New Books of Poetry

BALM IN GILEAD. By Helene Mullins. 98 pp. New York: Harper & Bros. $2.

WHEN a few years ago poems signed by Miss Mullins began to appear in periodicals it became quickly apparent that a poet of rare discernment and an artist of promise had appeared on the scene. This promise has never been belied by Miss Mullins in her subsequent work, which has, on the contrary, increased in profundity, in range and in perfectness of execution. So much so, indeed, that one now has come to watch for a collection of verse from her pen, well knowing it will not disappoint. The latest such book, the poet's third, bears the title of a sonnet-sequence which forms part of the contents, "Balm in Gilead."

One might quote any unit from this sequence and it would not fall greatly behind any other unit, so high a level does the poet reach and maintain. Yet if one be more to be singled out than another it is this:

Boast not your unassailable purity,
O soul that in the midst of life has stood
Indifferent and aloof; accordingly
As you have shunned the struggle, neither good
Nor evil shall descend to fertilize
You that are doomed forever to remain
Fallow and fruitless. Having been too wise
To risk disorder and defeat and pain,
Now is extracted from you by the just,
Inevitable law, the right to make
Your home upon this earth; within you, death
Shall sit and brood, and through the deepening rust,
The drowsy blood may not arise, nor slake
The thirst for life behind the failing breath.

It is not too much to say that this sonnet, in its reading of life, in its distinguished phrasing, its subtle use of the caesura to give dramatic sharpness to the lines (a use too rarely understood by many who essay this difficult form) its subtle balancing of vowels and consonants to bring cut their tonal values and tonal variations, measurably approaches the mastery of Rossetti in his "House of Life" series. For those who find the involuted niceties of the sonnet form an unfailing source of poetic pleasure, this example from Miss Mullins's rich store will be a cherished piece.

But Helene Mullins can write in lighter vein when she desires—although one would never regard her work as a whole as other than finely serious. By way of illustration we instance the sestet from a sonnet called "Lady Loses Her Lover."

You will recover in a day or two,
Rise and go graciously to meet your friends,
Laughing to hear them say how young you seem,
Wearing a gown of periwinkle blue.
For such capricious ladies grief soon ends,
And life flows onward like a pleasant dream.

And is this so much in lighter vein as appears on the surface? Clearly it is not; and there is a shaft of irony behind the softer words.

Miss Mullins has a pleasing liking for many forms; one will find in the book an experiment in Sapphics, the chant royal, the sestina and the double sestina. Such avidity for utilizing all the varied methods which engaged the elder poets attests the poetic curiosity and imagination Miss Mullins brings to her work. But we leave "Balm in Gilead" to the reader, satisfied that its power will make an impression both deep and lasting.

A BRAVERY OF EARTH. By Richard Eberhart. 127 pp. New York: Jonathan Cape & Harrison Smith. $2.

It is not often that a young man writes a lengthy philosophical poem, and still less often that a publisher risks presenting one. Yet we believe the publishers of "A Bravery of Earth," by Richard Eberhart, to have been well advised.

In his poem Mr. Eberhart, who is an American residing in Europe, and first receiving publication in England, is seeking to find a reading of life, a clue to life's meaning. We cannot reproduce in his own words enough of his work to bring out his results, but we quote what stands as the epilogue to his poem, although it might better have been printed as prologue and program:

Into the first awareness trembling,
Girded with mortality;
Into the second awareness plunging,
Impaled upon mentality;
Into the third awareness coming
To understand in men's action
Mankind's desire and destiny,
Youth lies buried and man stands up
In a bravery of earth.

Put more prosaically, the child is content with sensory experience. Next he becomes aware of his mental powers and tries by thinking to solve the riddle of his existence. Last he links himself with men in action, and thereby discovers that the totality of men's acts is that which is designated as life. The poem as a whole might be termed the metaphysics of behaviorism. Hitherto behaviorism has been a doctrine limited to psychology.

If we are to have philosophic poetry—and it is the conviction of the present writer that we have too little poetry with serious thought behind it—two questions are asked of the poet. One is: How convicing is his intellectual result? The second: Is his verse of high order? We answer the first question, as applied to Mr. Eberhart, that his argument is cogent. The second, that he has written excellent poetry, but not poetry of the highest excellence. We are, however, convinced his "Bravery of Earth" merits serious atten-

John Macy Discusses Eve's Daughters

ABOUT WOMEN. By John Macy. 314 pp. New York: William Morrow & Co. $2.50.

By ISABEL PROUDFIT

THIS book, as the author specifically says in the first chapter, is addressed to men, and its message to them is: Let there be less domination by women. The rest of the book is taken up with explaining why women do not deserve to wield this domination.

It is not, as the author points out, that he is "against women." It is merely that he is "against the wrong kind of thing women are trying to make of themselves," and "against the feeble, flabby-minded fellows men are permitting women to make of them." These, then, are the evils in modern life which he sets out energetically to correct by forensic means.

His method of argument is categorical. Chapter by chapter he takes up "The Delusion of Equality," "Logic and the Ladies," "Women and Morals," and so on, setting forth successively that women are not as strong physically, or as well-balanced mentally, as men, and that they are not superior morally to the stronger sex. Tucked in among these vigorous assertions are two chapters headed "The Superior Parent" and "Why Women Should Talk," which explain that women make better mothers than men and that women should maintain their customary "incessant gabble" in order to teach their children the meaning of words—"to knit into a child's brain the texture of language."

Only incidentally in his introductory chapter does the author discuss women and business (the practical side of that historically interesting question of what work women should do). The esthetic side of that same question he also disposes of in the introductory chapter. In other words, he confines himself very largely to the more empirical aspects of feminist thought—whether or not women are more mysterious than men, whether or not they are more intuitive in their thinking, whether or not they are more virtuous. This is certainly a more old-fashioned approach to the subject of women than has been made in some time.

Most feminists of the modern school will regret this approach very much. They would so much rather hear him discuss what work women are best adapted to do than what virtues they may or may not possess. Apparently, however, the author accepts without question the idea that rearing a few children does and should occupy the whole of a woman's adult life. The fact that it never has, since Eve was turned out of the Garden, and Ruth went out to reap in the fields of Boaz, and Penelope took to ripping out her knitting at night in order to keep herself busy on the following day, never seems to cut much ice in anti-feminist argument. The whole subject of what work women should do when the baby's nose does not need wiping is dismissed by Mr. Macy with a few words to the effect that not many women look as if they could direct large corporations and that men make the best cooks anyway.

Reduced to syllogistic form, his line of reasoning seems to be about like this:

Men are better at cooking, big business, direct action, logic, the creative arts and baseball.

Women are better at coaxing, tending babies, impressing the men, following up detail and getting what they want.

Therefore, men are superior to women, and should assert their superiority more.

The defects in this piece of argument, as logic, are obvious, and there is also the fact, which the author candidly admits, that men don't assert their superiority, or indeed their intellectual independence, as well as they ought. In discussing their failure to do so, Mr. Macy seems to be surprisingly ignorant of modern psychological and educational theory on this very point. Men, he says, should not allow women to dominate their intellectual life. Yet why, according to modern theory, worked out very largely by men psychologists and educators, do grown men allow women to dominate and dictate to them?

The answer is that little children frequently suffer from too much mother and too little father in their backgrounds. The "gentle, subtle conquest of little children," which he declares to be the supreme job and aptitude of women, is being badly criticized these days as a parental program. Bind the child to his mother and you will bind the adult man to dependence on women and their opinions all his life, says the modern educator. Bind a woman to her children as her sole care and responsibility and you will make her unreasonably possessive in her attitude toward those children long after they need or want to be her care and responsibility.

This, and other fundamental questions along the same lines, must be more fully answered by Mr. Macy, if he is to meet psychological, as well as feminist, argument about the nature of women. In calling on the men to be no longer flabby, he must ask them to consider also their duty as fathers of future flabby men. In urging women to devote themselves exclusively to the care and training of their children, he must recognize the almost inevitable result that women will do all they can to make their children reflect their own ideas and opinions. The great weakness of Mr. Macy's book is that he fails to consider these points in forming his opinion about women.

Death Valley, Deadly And Alluring

Bourke Lee Makes a Thorough Study of Its Character and History

DEATH VALLEY. By Bourke Lee. Illustrated. 210 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $4.

ON the last page of Mr. Lee's book is the story of a jeweler in Hannibal, Mo., who was called upon to repair a queer-looking ring in which was set "a green-blue stone carved into a bullfrog." The jeweler "gurgled and vibrated and waved his arms." The customer wanted to know why. The jeweler explained:

> My God! I made this ring in Rhyolite in 1907. * * * Say, wasn't Rhyolite some town! For twenty years I've been trying to forget the times I had in Rhyolite. And I just get them all forgotten and settled down with a nice business and you have to come in here with one of my bullfrog rings! My God! Now I got to go back to that country. I'll never be happy if I don't.

Mr. Lee understood this strange reply because he, too, had been in Rhyolite, which is, or was, a mining town on the Nevada side of Death Valley. After reading Mr. Lee's book almost any one will understand. For Mr. Lee has made the worst and hottest desert in the United States so luridly attractive that, what with Spring fever coming on and everything, it is all a normal person can do to resist dropping everything—even reviewing Mr. Lee's book—and going there. However, that might be a mistake at this season of the year. Between May and October the temperatures in Death Valley often go to 130 degrees and higher. About once a week there is a sand storm so strong "that a man cannot stand up against it" and so hot that according to Bill Corcoran it "turns the valley into a pot of boiling glue." The Indians called the valley "Tomesha," which means "ground afire." So, as Mr. Lee says, "no one who is wise enters the valley in the Summer." For a long time no white man who could help it, or who was not looking for precious minerals, entered it at all. But that, as Mr. Lee shows, was also a mistake. Death Valley is eminently worth entering. For those who like such things it is one of the most alluring spots in the United States.

Mr. Lee has made a thorough and loving study of the desert, telling of its climate and superficial appearence, its early inhabitants, the experiences of some of the early emigrants who blundered into it, its mining booms and mining towns, its plants and animals, and its geographical reason for being. He writes with terseness and with an appropriately dry humor. There is no doubt that he knows his valley thoroughly in all of its aspects, though he consistently refrains from making much of any personal experience.

Death Valley was probably named after the tragic adventures of the so-called Jayhawker party and some others who tried to reach California by this route in 1849. Women and children were among them. They got through but not without hideous suffering and loss of life. Thus the valley, which is a sinister sister of the Colorado and Mojave deserts, was introduced into white men's history. The Paiute Indians had known it for many generations and they had managed to find water and food where the white man died of hunger and thirst. Perhaps the most fascinating sections of Mr. Lee's books are his two chapters on the Palutes, their ways of living and their traditions, By the time the white men came the Paiute of Death Valley was no longer a warrior—"he was just a hungry Indian." He wandered over ancient trails, leading from one watering place or feeding ground to another. He lived on "nuts, seeds, fruits, leaves, fleshy stems of plants, bulbs, roots, the inner bark of trees, mammals, birds, reptiles, fishes and insects." He ate pine nuts, roasted or ground into flour; cactus seeds; parts of the mesquite pod and the screw bean; the leaves of the agave or mescal; and also mice, lizards, grasshoppers, crickets and snakes. He used the bow and arrow with great skill, and made excellent basket-ware, though very crude pottery. Life was very hard and there was little sympathy for the sick or the old. Medicine men did their best to cure the afflicted. If they failed in this they were killed and new medicine men elected. But despite the grimness of their environment and the hardships of their lives the Paiutes of Death Valley believed that they were descended from the gods, and they loved their land and were proud of themselves and of their valley. Though not habitually warriors they fought the white man with desperate courage when there seemed no other way. Today they refuse to live on reservations and for the most part are industrious, self-respecting and self-supporting.

The emigrants of 1849 and 1850 told of a lost mine or mines in the desert, and these have been sought for at intervals ever since. There was a "strike" at Panamint in 1872 and subsequently other rich finds brought wild mining towns into being. The stories of these towns are like those of other similar communities, except that the desert lent them an extraordinary picturesqueness. Panamint "lasted not quite four years," and was a "rooten, tooten town" every minute of the time. Darwin, established a little later, has lingered on, with intermittent booms. In 1880 borax was discovered, and "Borax" Smith made a fortune out of it. The great strike at Bullfrog, or Rhyolite, was made by Shorty Harris in 1904, and by 1907 the town had three railroads. Two miners decided they were rich men and ought not to have to live on condensed milk. They imported a cow. The mummified remains of the cow were found in the abandoned Rhyolite railway station in 1927 when a Mr. McLaughlin bought it to live in. The last train out of Rhyolite had left nineteen years earlier. There were other strikes and other boom towns, with much drinking, some shooting and at least one lynching. The old prospectors still exist, holding out for fabulous sums for claims no one any longer wants to buy. Bill Corcoran said to the author: "We'll find another Goldfield. I know we can do it. And we won't have to look far, either. We'll find the biggest gold mine in the world."

Geologically, Death Valley is in its infancy—it is only between seven and eleven million years old. It was once part of the sea, then the bed of a lake. Its lowest point is a salt bed 300 feet below sea level. It is so hot in places that no plant life can be supported, yet its vegetation includes some 136 species. All this, and much more, Mr. Lee has told in the most delightful fashion imaginable. His numerous photographs give an excellent idea of the scenery of valley and mountains. All that one misses is a map.

August Strindberg, the Chaotic, in a New Biography

AUGUST STRINDBERG. The Bedeviled Viking. By V. J. McGill. 459 pp., with five illustrations. New York: Brentano's. $4.

August Strindberg.

IN spite of the considerable interest which John August Strindberg's life and work command on both sides of the Atlantic, he has hitherto been conspicuously neglected by American and English commentators. Wishing to find information on him, one has been forced to look up old magazine articles, or a chapter in some book on the modern drama, or other such casual sources: no detailed biography of him written in English has so far been extant and no special volume has been devoted to a wide-scope analysis of his total literary heritage. Meanwhile, few writers have called for analysis and investigation so peremptorily as he. This statement does not imply an overestimation of the famous Swede's works. No doubt, on Europe's literary horizon of the second half of the nineteenth century there were minds far more profound and artistically powerful than Strindberg's; but there hardly was a mind which could equal his in baffling strangeness. Was this unusual man—so suspicious, vituperative, anger-spitting and uneven—sane or insane? Where lay the cause of his famous anti-feminism and of his frenzied attacks on women which made him hate the feminist Ibsen, which prompted him to quarrel with Björnson and which did not prevent him from having been married three times in succession? How to account for his constant rushing from one philosophic extreme to the other? (In this, by the way, he resembled Tolstoy, but he, was far more irrelevant, far less profound, than Tolstoy.) Finally, in the great mass of his plays, novels and stories, what is genuine—and even high-grade art and what is merely hasty, passionate outcry caused by some new hatred or fancy? To these questions we have had hitherto no well-founded answers.

Thus, new biographies of Strindberg are welcome, and one opens Dr. V. J. McGill's work with great curiosity. Unfortunately, however, it falls short of satisfying one. Although containing some good pages, and adding this and that to our knowledge of the chaotic Scandinavian, it is not free of rather serious defects.

Dr. McGill's purpose is not only to tell the main facts of Strindberg's life, but also to characterize and interpret his deep "subterranean" personality, that personality of which his writings were an artistic equivalent, and to establish a connection between his works and the various stages of his biography. This is laudable: a writer's biography always should be interpretative in that sense, or else it loses its raison d'être. But the blending of exposition with interpretation is always a difficult problem, and it is in the mixture that the weakest point of Dr. McGill's book lies, for, on the whole, the author has failed to integrate these elements into one harmonious narrative. His interpretative passages, which are very long and replete with repetition, cut into the story of Strindberg's life rather clumsily, mutilating it and often killing its interest.

The biographer is right in stressing the misery into which Strindberg was born (he was the son of a servant girl and of a petty merchant), the humiliations which he experienced as a hungry student at the aristocratic university of Upsala, and the endless financial difficulties which beset him even in the first decades of his fame: all this, undoubtedly, contributed, on the one hand, to the development of his unbearable susceptibility to real or fancied offense (his artistic denunciations often transformed themselves into angry slander directed against this or that person), and, on the other, to his self-adoration verging on megalomania (in the last years of his life, he regarded all criticism of his works as almost blasphemy). Dr. McGill is, however, less convincing when he tries to explain Strindberg's strange mixture of fear, hatred, adoration and deification of women by the "Oedipus complex"—he overworks this Freudian point time and again.

Perhaps the most interesting passages of the book are devoted to the famous writer's relations with Siri von Essen, his first wife, and to the cause of their divorce. During the ten-odd years of their marriage Strindberg, as it is known, passed through terrific contrasts of supreme happiness and suffering: today it seemed to him that Siri was a saint; tomorrow he saw in her a hideously perverted and dissolute creature, eluding him like a snake and even trying to kill him by slow poisoning. Was there truth in these suspicions? Strindberg himself did not know. In his autobiographical "Confession of a Fool," he leaves the question unanswered, and it is exactly this constant uncertainty that tortured him above all. From Dr. McGill's narrative one gathers that at least the greater part of these suspicions were but a fruit of Strindberg's abnormal imagination. Yet, here our author is at times deplorably nebulous. It seems to the reviewer that his narrative would have gained very much if he had attempted to draw with more precision the portrait and the true rôle of Siri who, unfortunately, remains rather cloudy and unintelligible to the reader.

Nebulousness is, generally speaking, one of Dr. McGill's defects. At moments it seems that he fails to convey to the reader with sufficient convincingness the deep inner logic of Strindberg's character simply because he himself has not fully grasped it.

That Pioneer Merchant, John Wanamaker

Mr. Appel Writes a Biography Which Is Also a History Of Merchandising Development

THE BUSINESS BIOGRAPHY OF JOHN WANAMAKER, FOUNDER AND BUILDER: America's Merchant Pioneer from 1861 to 1922. With Glimpses of Rodman Wanamaker and Thomas B. Wanamaker. By Joseph H. Appel. Illustrated. 497 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $5.

By G. W. HARRIS

JOHN WANAMAKER'S mother wanted him to devote his life to the ministry of religion, and for some time in his youth he thought seriously of becoming a clergyman—particularly in a spirit of thanksgiving for his restoration to health after a threat of tuberculosis when he was 19 years old. "But the idea clung to my mind," he said, "that I could accomplish more in the same domain if I became a merchant and acquired means and influence." In the course of many years his youthful wisdom was justified. By his lively interest in the religious life, his means and his influence he undoubtedly did accomplish more in that domain than he could have done had he been a preacher. Probably few young men ever made such deliberate choice of vocation.

> I took an enormous sheet of brown paper [he said] and wrote down on it all the different things I thought I should like to be. I remember it very clearly to this day (at the age of about 77). I put down architect because I had always been interested in the making of buildings. I put down journalist and doctor and clergyman—the latter a vocation which my mother was very anxious to have me take up. After several others which I do not now recall, I wrote merchant. One by one I went over the list and after careful deliberation struck out various words for one reason or another. Finally merchant was left and I turned my attention seriously to work.

In this new "Business Biography" by Mr. Appel, who has been in the employ of the Wanamaker organization for thirty years, the "founder's" religious and patriotic activities are touched upon only as they affected his business life, but they did that at all times and to a controlling extent. Called a merchant prince, but preferring to call himself a merchant pioneer, John Wanamaker was a merchant who believed (in his own words) that "the Golden Rule of the New Testament has become the Golden Rule of business"; who in the face of cynical sneers—"Pious John" and "Honest John"—continued to shatter the old idea that religion has no place in business, and business no place in religion; who testified, after living concurrently in both realms for more than sixty years:

> The temptations of business are great, and unless a merchant has more than a creed or the ordinary groundwork of honesty and faithfulness he may be caught by the sudden wind of plausible opportunity and tumble over the precipice and be ruined. * * * I am glad to stand up and say that religion is the only investment that pays the largest dividend possible to receive.

Mr. Appel has drawn a full-length portrait of the man as pioneer, organizer, business builder, "with almost a seer's vision of what would best serve the people in their daily living," with the capacity to apply his dreams through new methods of trading and with "a genius for dramatizing the new kind of business" in his advertising. Indeed, he hails Wanamaker as the pioneer advertising merchant who made business articulate and thus established mutual confidence between buyer and seller.

A restless spirit, deriving from the Reformation and the Huguenots, with a strain of Scottish blood, his great-grandfather a fighter in the Colonial Army, his grandfather a lay preacher and pioneer, his parents zealous in work and religion—"a crusading spirit finding a new outlet in business—John Wanamaker was born in a rural community on the southern outskirts of Philadelphia, on July 11, either 1837 or 1838. The year is uncertain, for there are no family or church records to fix the exact date. His father was a brick-maker, and as a child he helped in the brickyard occasionally, but not strenuously, for he was rather frail. He lived near the woods, and the love of nature therein acquired remained with him throughout his life. He had only a scant two years of schooling, but reading was his recreation as a boy and became a passion that persisted all his life. He literally read himself into "a Benjamin Franklin education."

When he was 14 he got his first job as errand boy for a Philadelphia publishing firm at $1.25 a week. Within a few months he found a better-paying job in a clothing store, where he received $2.50 a week as stock boy. Thence he went to a rival establishment at $6 a week, where he stayed three years. He demanded a substantial increase, or a share in the business, and when refused he told the proprietor that he would open a store of his own near by and take his trade. But his health failed. Tuberculosis threatened, and he was ordered West. He traveled 3,500 miles, going as far as Northern Minnesota. He returned to Philadelphia at the close of 1857, greatly improved in health, although not fully restored, and for a time abandoned business and turned to religious activities, becoming the first paid secretary of the Y. M. C. A.

In 1860 he married, and the next year (having been rejected for military service in the Civil War because of the condition of his lungs) he formed a partnership with his brother-in-law, Nathan Brown, and started for himself as a dealer in men's ready-made clothing. Many years later Wanamaker said that his sales for the first day totaled $24.67, of which amount he put 67 cents in the cash drawer to make change the next day and paid the $24 to The Public Ledger for an advertisement. And then began, according to Mr. Appel, a series of business innovations that later largely revolutionized the storekeeping of his age—helping to establish in America the one-price system which banished the uncertainty of haggle and barter;

For the first few years it was a hard struggle. Credit was shy. His novel principles and advertising made enemies. The jobbers banded against him. But when the Civil War ended, business began to boom. In 1868 Nathan Brown died and Wanamaker bought the interest of his estate. As the sole owner as well as manager of the business, he began expanding.

In 1885 Robert C. Ogden and Thomas B. Wanamaker were admitted to partnership with John Wanamaker, and in 1896 his long cherished ambition to enter the New York field was realized by the purchase of the old A. T. Stewart business. A new and larger building was needed, and it was erected in the following year. At the same time he was building a gigantic new store in Philadelphia. Then came the panic and rumors were rife that Wanamaker had failed. He did have the hardest fight of his commercial life, but he pulled through and was able to write about it later: "Why should I consider it a terrible experience? It was a great lesson—and then, blessed discovery, most everybody stood by me." The "Golden Jubilee" of the business was celebrated in 1911, and on Dec. 30, of that year, the new Philadelphia store building was dedicated by President Taft, who hailed Wanamaker as "the greatest merchant in America." He was then 73 years old, but there was to be no climax in his life. He continued in the active management of the business almost to the day of his death at 84.

There had been something of an interlude in his personal business career when he served as Postmaster General in the Administration of Benjamin Harrison (1889-93). In that office he established sea postoffices, created a rural free delivery, enlarged the free delivery service in towns and abolished the mail privileges of lotteries. He reorganized the entire postal service of the Pacific Slope. He established city tubular post routes. He advocated better roads to facilitate mail delivery and publicly championed the establishment of postal savings depositories, a parcel post and a postal telegraph.

As for the man himself, Mr. Appel writes:

> A friendly man, by nature. A solitary, by force of circumstances. He could meet people on their own level, high or low, learned or ignorant, noble or debased, because he felt the kinship of humanity. But he could not work with a board of directors because he had to be the board. In his church relations, sociable and companionable. In his business, approachable and sympathetic with all workers. Yet in control—in both fields—autocratic. He was not a "joiner." His only fraternal association was Masonic. He would not join business associations, though he hid from no business anything that would aid its development, and in his writings he freely gave his experiences that would help all businesses. He lived largely alone because he lived ahead of others. Few can keep up with the eagle.

To a considerable extent this book is autobiographical, making liberal use of its subject's own words from his diaries, letters, speeches and newspaper advertisements. Besides constituting a full-length biography of John Wanamaker, with supplementary sketches of his two sons—Thomas B., who died in 1908, and Rodman, who survived his father by only a little more than five years—the book has much to say of merchandising theory and practice, of salesmanship, of advertising and publicity. Mr. Appel writes as a hero-worshiper, and it must be added in conclusion that his treatment of the Wanamakers, father and sons, is unvaryingly laudatory in tone.

John Wanamaker.

General Mitchell Surveys Aeronautics

SKYWAYS. A Book on Modern Aeronautics. By General William Mitchell. 307 pp. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

THE appearance of another popular book on aviation is almost enough to make one shudder with the literary ague. Certain exceptions must be made, however, in favor of Brig. Gen. Mitchell's book. It is not that he has anything new, novel or startling to offer, but the fact that his is a wide and understanding grasp of the actuality and the trend of modern aeronautics, and it is this that makes his book noteworthy. There are some objections to be made, a misunderstanding here and there of the science of physics, a not always clear literary style and occasionally a breach of what some people might call good taste. But when the book is viewed from the standpoint of its contents, the author's simple treatment of so vast and so complex a subject is commendable alike to the layman and the expert.

With General Mitchell's career in mind one begins his book in the expectation of reading some violent opinions on the absence of and the necessity for a unified air force. He does, indeed, touch upon the subject in a cogent paragraph or two with all the force of logic on his side; but elsewhere he is surveying the aeronautical field, not for the also-rans, but for the runners of today and for those who will run tomorrow. In a word, his book is forward-looking and written with the authority of a man who is among the foremost and most experienced aviators in the country—the man who commanded the United States air force during the war and who so courageously but perhaps rashly defended the ideal of a unified air force in Washington.

In regard to a separate air force for the United States, General Mitchell has this to say, after a survey of air organizations of the world:

> All over the world, aviation is taking its place as a major activity of the governments, organized in each into a department by itself which is on an equal basis with any other government department, and with a Minister or Cabinet member at its head. * * * The only great country in which this condition does not exist is the United States. Here the air activities are distributed between the War Department, Navy, Commerce, Treasury and Postoffice Departments and other organizations, political or financial, that want to use aviation as a football. It is a disgraceful condition to contemplate. We have no air force worthy of the name and our commercial aviation is very poor. The great number of accidents that are occurring is a by-product of such a state of affairs.

Many people will take exception to statements that America has no air force worthy of the name, that commercial aviation here is poor and that many of our accidents are the result of a decentralized system. The exaggerations are perhaps unpardonable, but thoughtful students of modern aeronautics will be inclined to see some substance of truth in the shadows of overstatement.

For the rest of the book is an informal and excellent discussion of the many activities that go on in the wide sphere of aeronautics, including a chapter on airships, engines, instruments, maps, military aviation, &c. An arresting chapter is the last in which the author takes up the future of aviation. He has crowded a tremendous amount of knowledge into an entertaining book, and leavened it with many an instructive and ofttimes hair-raising episode out of his own experience.

A Broad Survey of the Arts In Soviet Russia

Three Writers Cover the Fields of Literature, the Theatre, The Cinema, Painting and Music

The Illustrations on This Page Are From Woodcuts by A. I. Kravtschenko.

VOICES OF OCTOBER. Art and Literature in Soviet Russia. By Joseph Freeman, Joshua Kunitz and Louis Lozowick. 317 pp. With 14 illustrations. New York: The Vanguard Press. $4.

By ALEXANDER NAZAROFF

DURING recent years, more than enough has been written in this country on Soviet achievements or failures on "the first two fronts" of Russia's national life, that is to say, on the "fronts" of politics and economics (Soviet papers adore the aggressive jargon of such pugnacious expressions). But the "third front," that of Russia's cultural life in general and arts in particular, has hitherto remained conspicuously neglected. Why was it so? Because, even to the most daring travelers, a month's visit to Moscow did not seem to be a sufficient qualification for making statements on so complicated a subject? Perhaps. However it may be, the volume here under review is, unless the present reviewer is mistaken, the first survey of the whole field of Soviet literature, theatre, cinema, painting and music to appear in English. It is in this that its timeliness and interest lie.

"Voices of October" is the work of three authors: Joseph Freeman, Joshua Kunitz and Louis Lozowick; each one of them has covered in his chapter (or chapters) this or that section of the field under survey. Their purpose is not so much to appraise critically the value and methods of Soviet arts (in some of the chapters, such appraisals, at least in direct form, are entirely absent), as to describe their production, show it to the reader. In this the authors succeed; their book is rich in interesting facts and information. Not all the branches of art are dealt with at equal length and with equal success. Most of the attention is devoted to the Soviet literature: two chapters dealing with it, one by Mr. Freeman and the other by Mr. Kunitz, take up more than a half the volume and form its most substantial and interesting part. Soviet music, to the contrary, is described in a very brief and—from the viewpoint of its contents—decidedly weak chapter by Mr. Freeman. What is the attitude of our authors toward their subject? From the very first pages of the book, one feels that they are not only sympathizers, or even admirers, of Soviet Russia and of everything Soviet-Russian, but also men fully sharing the Marxist philosophy of Soviet rulers. Thus, to expect from them academic aloofness would be a mistake. On the whole, the volume is written smoothly, clearly and pleasingly; most of it reads with interest.

What is the scope of freedom allowed to art under the Soviet régime? In his preface to the volume, Mr. Freeman describes Soviet art as free and rejects as "infantile" the assertion that it is "limited by a narrow, official Communist outlook." Yet contradicting this statement of his own, he says in Chapter First:

> No contemporary Russian artist can afford to be socially unconscious; no artist can justify his work in the opinion of the revolutionary proletariat unless it is to some extent in harmony with the proletariat's fundamental aims—which include not only the socialization of economic production and distribution but of cultural production and distribution as well.

These words are much nearer to the reality than Mr. Freeman's first statement. And it is a pity that Mr. Freeman does not stop to disclose their meaning. For what do they mean? They mean that the artist, let us say, the novelist, is limited not merely in the expression of his political opinions. What is far more serious, he is pinned down to one subject, one theme. He must, no matter whether he wants to or not, "be socially conscious," that is to say, reflect in his novels the struggle between the proletarian psychology and characters and "bourgeois" psychology and characters. What happens if he fails to do so, and, forgetting all class questions, writes, for instance, a mere psychological story of love? The editors of the monthlies and publishing companies controlled by the government and the Communist party (and all of them are thus controlled in Russia) will tell him that it has "no interest of actuality" (is it not typical, indeed, that, in these last years practically no love novels untinged by politics have been written in Russia?). And what if, writing a "class novel," he makes his bourgeoisie attractive and his proletarians unattractive? Once it may be tolerated. But if it be repeated the Soviet critics immediately will start to accuse the writer of "betraying the laboring masses" and of "sympathizing with émigrés" (how often one has read such denunciations in Soviet periodicals!). The result again will be that the writer will not have his manuscripts published. Thus, the Soviet novelist is completely "State-controlled": both his subjects and his tendencies are forced upon him. Is it not here that one of the causes of the sterility of the Soviet fiction lies? Indeed, in the last twelve years, all important European countries have produced books which attracted the attention of the world; but has Soviet Russia produced one such book?

Are the "Marxist principles" applied also to the theatre, music, painting, &c.? Of course. Here, too, art must be revolutionary and proletarian. It is true that, as Mr. Lozowick tells us in the theatre, such an anachronism of the old régime as Stanislavsky's Art Theatre still continues to exist, although it sees itself obliged to "revolutionize" gradually its répertoire. Yet the salient features of Moscow's theatrical life are not Stanislavsky's productions but the "daring experiments" of V. Meyerhold, who wants to be revolutionary, cost what it may. To achieve this purpose he introduces cubes, trapezoid platforms and ladders in his stage settings; his actors (to resemble workmen?) work, build, do gymnastical tricks on the stage; moreover, he takes classical plays, like Gogol's "Inspector," and changes their text in all imaginable ways, inserting revolutionary passages, omitting entire scenes, adding new ones, &c. What does Mr. Lozowick think about this strange mutilation of classics? He regards Meyerhold as a stage genius and his production of "The Inspector" as a great achievement. In music, too, Mr. Freeman tells us, a number of composers are writing things which are revolutionary not in the formal, but in the political and social sense of the word. Political revolutionism in music—what does this nonsense mean? And how can one speak in earnest of such a thing as revolutionary or counter-revolutionary sounds? Perhaps, however, this is not unnatural: to earn their living by pleasing the ruling party, composers may have to utter such things. It is true, however, that as we can gather it from the book here under review, in music, painting and theatre, the situation is somewhat different than in literature; if in literature practically no old figures survive (unless they have subscribed to all new requirements), the whole field being thoroughly revolutionized, in these three branches of art such survivors there are: Glazunov's pupils live and work, Myaskovsky, a genuine and very outstanding composer of the old generation, continues to create.

An interesting and very informative chapter is devoted by Mr. Freeman to the Soviet cinema, its organization, working and productions. In this realm, the Soviet Government actually has secured important achievements. It is true that most of the Soviet photoplays, from "Potemkin" to "Old and New," are heavily stuffed with propaganda; but this in no way diminishes their high artistic and technical merits. Mr. Freeman quotes, by the way, Douglas Fairbanks's words:

> The Russians have a more advanced understanding of the science of motion and movement than any other picture makers in the world. I have the privilege of going to school—picture-wise—in Russia.

In what social milieu does Soviet art thrive? We find an answer to this question in Mr. Kunitz's chapter entitled "Men and Women in Soviet Literature," which is by far the best single chapter of the volume. Quoting at length from various novels and stories as from realistic records of Soviet life, Mr. Kunitz draws a picture of the city and village, of the still surviving intellectuals and of Soviet bureaucrats, of Bohemian sets and of the moods prevailing among the Soviet youths. He does it vividly and well. Of course, like his two co-authors, he fully sympathizes with the world he depicts. And yet, what dark, sad pages are there in his picture! Terrific brutality and hooliganism; sexual promiscuity; unusually numerous cases of suicide—such are, according to Mr. Kunitz, some of the features of the life of Soviet youths which have attracted the attention of the Soviet press and literature. Of course, such happenings are not a general rule; but they are very frequent. This is, then, the reality which Soviet art has to reflect. No wonder that after wading through a Soviet novel or collection of poems one pants for fresh air and for things a bit less daring.

Cairo Before the Days of the Tourist Invasion

Gerard de Nerval's Classic Travel Narrative Becomes Available in an Excellent English Version

THE WOMEN OF CAIRO: Scenes of Life in the Orient. By Gerard de Nerval. With an Introduction by Conrad Elphinstone. Two volumes. 685 pp. New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co. $7.50.

By HERBERT GORMAN

TO think of Gérard de Nerval is to think of "Sylvie," of "Le Rêve et La Vie," of the series of sonnets which includes "El Desdichado." It is not to think of the "Voyages en Orient." Yet that work, now properly selected and excellently translated in two handy volumes, throws much light on le bon Gérard and certainly presents him in a new guise to English readers. De Nerval probably regarded this work as a bread-and-butter enterprise, something to serialize in a periodical over a length of time (it appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes during 1846 and 1847) and not in any way as a betrayal of his peculiar genius. To orientate this work we must know a little about the mind and career of de Nerval.

Gérard de Nerval (born Labrunie) was a tremendous dreamer who walked through a world of phantoms all his life. He was born at Paris in 1808, the son of a Surgeon Major; and he died by suicide in 1855. Between those two dates stretches a life that was often painful, occasionally exalted and always set apart from the actual world about him. Early in youth he fell in love with the girl whom he called Adrienne and whom, under many names, he loved to the sad end of his life. His early manhood passed among the Romantics of his day. He wrote in a desultory fashion, dreamed intensively and wandered about Europe much. Among his close friends he counted Théophile Gautier, Arsène Houssaye and Alexandre Dumas père. In his maturity he fell in love with the little actress, Jenny Colon, who seemed to him a reincarnation of Adrienne, and it appears to have been because of a rupture with her that he first manifested those symptoms of madness that placed him several times in Dr. Blanche's asylum for the insane. One day he was found strolling through the Palais-Royal leading a lobster at the end of a blue ribbon. He explained gravely that that was because the crustacean did not bark and knew the secrets of the sea. Shortly afterward (March 21, 1841) he was committed to the asylum but was released several months later as cured. In 1842 Jenny Colon died and it was to assuage his grief and to put as many miles as possible between him and the memory of the little blond actress that de Nerval set out for the East and embarked upon those travels which resulted in "Voyages en Orient," now translated as "The Women of Cairo." By 1844 he was back in Paris where he spent several years in writing graceful articles and wandering about the streets in a rapt dream. But the seeds of madness (if his peculiar and mysterious exaltation can be called madness) were in him and a number of times he was incarcerated in mad-houses. Once Heinrich Heine had him committed. He was at work on "Le Rêve et La Vie," an account of his own madness, when the end came. One day in January, 1855, he came to the office of the Revue de Paris and showed Théophile Gautier and Maxime du Camp an apron string. "It is the girdle that Mme. de Maintenon wore when she had 'Esther' performed at Saint-Cyr," he announced. Several days later he wrote to a friend, "Come and prove my identity at the police-station of the Châtelet." The night before he had been working on "Le Rêve et La Vie" in a low pot-house of Les Halles quarter and had been arrested as a vagabond. Before leaving the police station he drew the apron-string from his pocket and announced that it was the garter of the Queen of Sheba. It was bitterly cold in Paris and frozen snow covered the sidewalks. On the night of the 25th of January, 1855, the proprietor of a cheap doss-house in a filthy alley called the Rue de la Vieille-Lanterne heard somebody knocking at the door. It was 3 o'clock in the morning and the proprietor did not answer. In the morning the frozen body of Gérard de Nerval was found hanging by the apron-string to a bar of the window. This, then, was the man who wrote "The Women of Cairo."

Although it is true that de Nerval fled from the civilization of Paris into the East to escape the memory of a dead woman no sign of this will be found in "The Women of Cairo." Here the author is calm, seemingly cheerful, always curious, and quite objective. He loved the East (as so many Romantics did), was enchanted by its color, its mystery, even its dirt. The twisting streets of Cairo, the mysterious veiled women who passed one like so many ghosts, the blind muezzins crying from the minarets of the mosques, the braying donkeys and belching camels, the story-tellers and female dancers, the bazaars and curious theatres, the slave marts and the palaces of the Pasha, the dream-like gardens and the yellow waters of the Nile, the towering pyramids and the enigmatic Sphinx, the dahabeahs with their slanting sails, all of these strangely foreign aspects of an alien life enchanted and delighted de Nerval. It is, therefore, a cheerful book that one reads in the two volumes of "The Women of Cairo." It must be remembered that this travel narrative by Gérard de Nerval was written almost a hundred years ago and that his Cairo was far more primitive and less spoilt by the tourist (although de Nerval does poke some fun at the stodgy Englishmen who visited Cairo during his time) than the Cairo of today with its motor cars, its large hotels and its tourist agencies. Mummies had not become merchandise when de Nerval let his beard grow, adopted native garments, bought a female slave and settled down in Cairo. The old habits predominated. The great slave marts were open and doing a thriving business, the memory of Bonaparte had not faded from the minds of the gray-bearded sheiks, and the Pasha, Mehemet-Ali, ruled the city. To read the observations of de Nerval and to follow him in his adventures (for he was a true traveler and not a tourist, a man who submerged himself with the natives and not an aloof foreigner) is decidedly entertaining, then; for a life that has now dwindled and been colored by alien influences was practically untainted and not emasculated during the period whereof de Nerval writes. And it is the things in which one is interested that occupy the restless and curious mind of the Frenchman. He does not waste dreary pages in describing monuments (although all of the great ones are vividly visualized), but rather by keeping his eyes and ears open and venturing in places that most travelers would hastily pass by or view cursorily with a protecting dragoman, illuminates the little mysterious daily gestures and habits of the natives. He may be mistaken in some of his conclusions, but "The Women of Cairo" as a whole is decidedly instructive and always entertaining.

The translator and editor, Mr. Conrad Elphinstone, was wise to retitle the work "The Women of Cairo," for it is the feminine aspects of the book that prove most illuminating and unusual. The original Charpentier edition of "Voyages en Orient," which appeared in 1851, contains more material that this translation, but that is because Mr. Elphinstone, quite properly, omitted the section devoted to de Nerval's European travels and the series of appendices, which, after all, were lifted from Lane's "Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians." It is Egypt, Lebanon and Stamboul that are pictured in these volumes, all of that Near East that is now so much of a political factor in international diplomacy. As has been pointed out above, it is the pictures of women that will interest the reader most of all. Particularly is this true of de Nerval's picture of his purchase of a slave and his amusing and often vexatious relationship with her. She was Javanese and about as proud as they come. De Nerval's fond hopes that she would cook and clean for him (after all, he thought that a slave was a slave) were abruptly crushed after he possessed her a few days. She intimated that while she might be a slave she was no servant; rather was she a lady and she demanded treatment as such. After a time she became a sort of white elephant (if so monstrous an image may be applied to a pretty young girl) on de Nerval's hands and he was hard put to it to get rid of her. In fact, there were times when he became the slave of the slave. The manner in which he was forced to acquire the slave was amusing. He took a house in a native quarter and was preparing to settle down in it quite happily by himself when he was called upon by the much-agitated sheik of the quarter. That bearded son of the Prophet begged him to take back the rent money and remove himself from the district. When de Nerval demanded the reason the sheik explained that he (the sheik) thought that he (the bewildered Frenchman) was married, that the neighboring gentlemen (who were all married) resented an unattached fellow residing so close to their harems, and that de Nerval would have to procure himself a wife by hook or crook or get out. This was an indirect reflection on the complaisance of the surrounding harems for, surely, the irate husbands had some reasons for their suspicions. De Nerval at first considered marriage (it seemed these curious wedlocks only lasted so long as the traveler was on Egyptian soil), but finally decided that it would cost too much and that the complications might be unpleasant. It was then that he thought the acquisition of a female slave might settle the question. At least it would put a woman in his house and so still the protests and suspicions of his neighbors. The result was Zeynab.

A number of striking scenes stand out in "The Women of Cairo." Among then might be noted de Nerval's trip to the Pyramids and his climbing of the great one, the return of the huge caravan of pilgrims from Mecca, the native wedding which opens the book, the journey down the Nile, the dances of the dervishes, and the performance of "Caragueuz" at Stamboul. Interspersed with the more purely travel material are a number of local legends and tales told by the professional story-tellers, the longest one being that about Soliman-Ben-Daoud, better known to Christians as that King Solomon to whom Queen Balkis of Sheba came. The whole is woven together into a pleasant wandering narrative that betrays the fact that it was originally written for serialization in a periodical. But this shapelessness does not destroy its effect. The reader will seem to wander along with Gérard de Nerval through the strange scenes and places and among the alien peoples whom he describes with so vivid and trained a pen. This is just the sort of book to enchant the reader who has not forgotten his "Arabian Nights," for the spirit of that great collection of tales impregnates "The Women of Cairo." It is the right kind of travel book, too, for it is always crowded with personal impressions and knowledge for the sake of knowledge is not lugged in. It is astonishing to observe so sane a book written between attacks of insanity, but, then, the insanity of de Nerval was not the ordinary unbalancing of the brain. It was rather a complete surrender to visions. He once wrote: "I do not ask of God that He should change anything in events themselves, but that He should change me in regard to things, so that I might have the power to create my own universe about me, to govern my dreams, instead of enduring them." God did—but not in "The Woman of Cairo."

THE SOUTH: A FABRIC OF COTTON

Wrought Into a Section by the Crop That Became a Dynastic System, and Now Entangled in the Threads of an Industry Spun of the Same Fiber, It Looks to Diversity for Its Deliverance

By ANNE O'HARE McCORMICK

THE back-home trek of the cotton mill to the cotton field began fifty years ago and since 1920 has assumed the proportions and significance of an industrial migration. Although it coincides with two counter-movements, the westward shift of the Cotton Belt itself from the tired plantations of the Old South to the unexhausted and almost inexhaustible prairies of Texas and Oklahoma, and the determined push of the New South away from one crop and one industry, the effect of the transition is to concentrate the whole cycle in one section and thus to commit the South more than ever to the economy and psychology of cotton.

This transplanting of the textile tree in its natural soil, while widely celebrated, may not be wholly fortunate for the South. The habits of cotton are hard to break, and it happens, or perhaps it does not happen, that the industry has many of the characteristics of the crop. Cotton is always a poor payer; wherever it goes it ranges its workers on the agricultural and industrial mudsills. It used to be said that cotton and slavery are synonymous. They are synonymous still in the sense that the economic and social levels fixed by cotton are so low that millions who exist on them cannot, even in political orations, be described as enjoying freedom of opportunity, or what we defend against the world as the "American standard of living."

What most strikes the explorer in the cotton country is that it makes so many poor and so few rich. Producing 60 per cent of the world's cotton supply, engaging at least a third of the entire population in growing this staple and a third of the industrial population in the textile mills, the South not only has an income status far below that of the rest of the country, but that status is due as much to scarcity of great incomes as to prevalence of low wages. It is true that many of the vanished fortunes of the Old South were founded on cotton. At intervals since, particularly during the World War and immediately after, it was a highly profitable business. But over long periods, as today, the growers struggle with a poverty the grumbling wheat farmers never knew. The manufacturer prospers only by contrast. His profits and style of living are modest compared to those milked out of other industries. Neither in power nor wealth are there cotton barons on the scale set by the magnates of steel or copper, oil or automobiles. Other factors are important, of course, but cotton must have much to do with this disparity between North and South. Not for nothing is it called king and not by chance does industry fall into the fixed tradition of the court when it breaks into the kingdom.

For cotton is something more than a crop or an industry; it is a dynastic system, with a set of laws and standards always under assault and peculiarly resistant to change. It is map-maker, trouble-maker, history-maker; almost you can hang the epic of mankind on a thread of cotton. The first rising of Russian workers was the mutiny of the weavers in Peter the Great's new industrial centre. Those who insist on relating Lenin to the Romanoffs go as far back as that for the germ of the Soviets. The vicissitudes of Lancashire, once the loom of the world, now in more precarious state than any American textile area, are the industrial vicissitudes of England. In India the followers of Mahatma Gandhi signify rebellion by weaving their own cloth as well as making their own salt. The history of cotton would lead one to expect that violence on a large scale should first break out in the textile mill city of Sholapur.

The part played by cotton in the history of the United States needs no emphasis. It was cotton that made the South into a section. Cotton renewed the plantation system after it had begun to wane with the decline of rice, indigo and tobacco, and was flourishing only in the sugar fields of the lower Mississippi. Cotton re-established the Negro after the slave trade had been abolished in all but one State. On cotton, following Eli Whitney's invention of the gin in 1793, the South built up a social and political economy essentially different from that prevailing in the rest of the country. The two civilizations were bound to clash at last, for though the South was never more than 30 per cent cotton-growing or slave-owning, and would undoubtedly have come to emancipation without a war, the aristocratic idea embodied in the plantation system molded its entire development, and molds it still. The plantation of today is the same kind of patriarchate as the plantation of yesterday, and the cotton mill, when it comes South, inevitably falls into the patriarchal pattern. Later industries in their turn take their standard from the textile plant. So the basic crop makes the pattern, sets the standard, conditions the whole process of industrialization. That is the point of departure for every analysis of the present renaissance of the South.

Much has been written about the romance of cotton. It supported the only rural civilization America has ever known, which mingled grace and gayety. The New England farm at its best was a pinching struggle against nature; the Western farm was a pioneer's adventure, rough and lonely. The Southern plantation was a social unit, a manor in a village of clustering cabins; even in ruin, the wide and welcoming house set deep in trees more magical than any in the world, it reconstructs a life that never fails to evoke a sigh of regret. It dominated a social order with which nature lavishly cooperated. The fleecy fields turned silver in the strong sunlight, the slaves sang while they hoed and picked and pressed, sang through the slack and frostless evenings of the Southern Winter. There is an illusion of plenty and happy labor in the legend, in the bright-charm of climate and landscape, in the sound of banjos and rich song. The Negro still sings. You hear him along the rivers and the roads, at the presses, sometimes, although seldom, in the fields. The legend still inspires.

There is something about cotton like the power of poetry. Even when it is no more than a surplus crop or a depressed industry, it can be counted upon to stir the emotions, perhaps because through every process the fiber is alive and beautiful, perhaps because in all its processes it is natural and elemental, one of the few mechanical transformations man can still follow and understand.

"Have you noticed how everybody goes sentimental over cotton?" a woman labor organizer asked me in a textile town. "Planters, spinners, weavers, mill managers, and now even we union people. That man," indicating the speaker to whom we were listening, "never made a speech like that until he came down here. There is something irrational and romantic about cotton!"

Perhaps the romance is a kind of defense mechanism against reality. When William Green made his organizing trip through the South this Spring in behalf of the American Federation of Labor he was shocked to discover an American rural population to whom an industrial wage of $10 a week represented more money than they had ever seen. He realized that from such a water level you cannot develop much pressure for higher wage scales. Yet there is no such loud noise about the farmer's dollar in the South as there is in the West.

One reason is that the two political parties do not fight over the Southern farmer; some one should tell him how the competitive system works in politics. Another reason is that the vocal fraction of the rural South, the big planters and small owners, is exceedingly small. The third and all-sufficient reason is that for all shouting purposes there isn't any farmer's dollar in the South!

Assuming that the annual income of the tenant and cropper approximates $500, a figure between the lowest and highest estimates made in various local surveys, it must be noted that even this figure includes the value of the products he consumes. The cash remainder, such as it is, he seldom sees; it is spent before he earns it for elemental necessities advanced on credit at the plantation commissary or country store. Consider that nearly half the South still lives on such terms on the land; that the income of that half is only half the income of farmers elsewhere, and it is clear that the great income differential between this section and the rest of the country is in agricultural earnings.

But that does not tell the whole story. For that you must see the incredibly primitive conditions in which the cropper and the tenant commonly live. You must see the successor of the old plantation. It is worked by negroes and mules for the most part, exactly as it was worked in 1860. The best I saw was a "seventy-five mule farm" in the Alabama Black Belt. Of its 4,000 acres about half is planted in cotton, the rest in corn and hay for fodder and in pasture for a herd of Holsteins. The planter is an unusually enterprising, intelligent and energetic young man who follows all the modern rules—diversifies, rotates, fertilizes, fights the weevil with unceasing vigilance and applies bookkeeping methods to what is in fact what the old plantation was: an industrialized farm whose owner, in addition to managing all operations manages also the lives of the workers, bails them out of jail, settles the family quarrels, takes care of them when they are sick, shares their gains but stands their losses, treats them in general like children, or as the good master treated his slaves.

ON this better-than-typical plantation, in the family for several generations, half the workers are hired hands and the other half share croppers. There happen to be no share tenants, a class owning their own mule and implements, who pay a fixed proportion of their crops as rent for house and land. The laborers are housed and paid $25 a month for twelve months. The croppers get a cabin, fuel from the woods, the use of tools and mule; when the crop is sold they pay half the cost of fertilizing and ginning and receive half the proceeds of the cotton they cultivate. In the meantime they have a limited credit for supplies at the plantation store, which they must patronize because they can get credit nowhere else and where they pay higher prices than at the chain stores in the near-by town.

Last year, however, when the crop failed, the planter wrote off all their debts. Here, as elsewhere, the cropper's wife and children work; there are two schools on the place attended by the children under 14 during the five "off" months. The cabins, scattered about in the fields, are better than most, sheathed and fairly weather-proof. The planter complains that the tenants do not keep their houses in repair. They burn the fences and porches for firewood and are less well-nourished than they used to be, because whereas once they kept a cow and cultivated a garden patch, now they buy a second-hand car and pay 10 per cent of all they make for gasoline.

Tenants and croppers are for the first time on the move. They go careering about the country, from plantation to plantation, restless drifters from one dilapidated encampment to the next, with no attachment to any. Any change seems better than staying where they are, but the drift is always toward the towns. At the first chance they escape entirely from the farm, the whites to begin another round as the unskilled casuals of the mill villages, the Negroes to the tobacco factories or whatever small trades are open to them.

THE characteristic of cotton is that it is a tenant crop. More than half the farms are tenant farms. The porportion of tenancy grows as it does in other sections, but Southern tenancy is nothing like that of the middle West. The holdings here are small, often not more than twenty acres, and the farmer has no choice as to what he shall plant. He is always under some form of supervision, if only for the reason that he lives on the money advanced on his planted crop. The share cropper is "furnished" by the landlord, the tenant or small owner by the grocer or banker, but always the lien is on cotton, "the cash crop," and always at a rate of interest or a "time price" which makes his meager living the most expensive in the country.

This is the mold in which the old plantation survives. Some are abandoned, others neglected by absentee landlords, run by banks or efficiently operated by corporations. Outside the system there are, of course, in every State thousands of independently owned small farms. Nearly all are old-fashioned mule farms. It is not until one approaches the Mississippi Delta that one begins to envisage the plantation of the future. Here Old Man River comes into the picture, dominating the land and adding the extra hazard of flood to the risks of the cotton gambler. Here is the largest cotton plantation in the world, owned by an English company and cultivated entirely by machinery, even to the use of airplanes to dust the plants with arsenate against the weevil. Here the machine appears for the first time; the "Farm-All" bounces across the fields rich with the top soil of mid-America.

ALREADY the Texas steppes are raked by machinery, which requires immense flat tracts to be profitable. And while the substitution of machines for mules does not abolish the hand picker, but only renders his lot more precarious, here one reads nevertheless the doom of the old system. The mechanical picker is on the way. When it is perfected, the black gangs and the rhythmic chant will vanish from the fields. On top of the present surpluses, labor and crop, will be piled other surpluses. India is growing more cotton, Russia opens up the fresh plateaus of Turkestan; in the State docks at Mobile—as if we could not grow as poor cotton as anybody!—I saw a mountain of bales of cheap, low-grade staple from China, destined to be worked into "wool" blankets in Southern mills.

It is written that the last of the primitive must submit to the machine in the end. What happens, then, to the alleged law of supply and demand? As it is, the grower gluts the market even with mule-plowed, hand-picked cotton. He responds to all campaigns to reduce his acreage by planting more, in the unquenchable hope that the other fellow won't. And so true to form is cotton in all its phases that in the next stage of the cycle, the cotton mill, exactly the same policy prevails.

Mills and mill villages spread like ragged spider webs around the new textile centres—Charlotte, Greenville, Greensboro, Spartanburg—or are spotted singly along the red uplands of the Piedmont, as cloistered and self-centred as walled hill towns in the Middle Ages. Some mills produce only yarn, others weave the yarn into "grey goods," others bleach, dye, knit, finish, fashion into sheets, towels, upholstery, roofing, movie films, record disks, any of the 147 varieties of fabric or the 150 cottonseed products into which the star-shaped fluff on the cotton stalk can be transformed. There are small mills performing a single operation, and great, vertical plants, like the Cone and Pepperell Mills, that take in cotton by the bale and send it out by the bolt. These are the most prosperous establishments. So, also, in contradistinction to the factories that make anything, are those that specialize, sometimes to the point of virtual monopoly of a single product, like the manufacturers of Cannon towels or Johnson surgical gauze.

THE CHANGING SOUTH: A FABRIC OF COTTON

None is very prosperous now. The textile industry as a whole suffers from more than the current depression. Long before the general market crash, its dividends and the value of its securities steadily declined. Today you can go from plant to plant, selected at random to represent good, bad and indifferent conditions, and find the majority running part-time and frankly "in the red." Not a few are operating that by every law of sound economics should be closed down. Overproduction, a kind of magnificent perseverance in insolvency, characterizes the cotton factory as well as the field. The reason in both cases is the same. The textile situation in the South has to be interpreted as a transference into industry of the plantation and the plantation psychology. Feudal, of course; non-economic, in apparent ignorance of the great American discovery that high wages make low costs by increasing production and purchasing power; but with the heroic virtues of the feudal system.

NOWHERE as in the South, I think, will you find so many employers who feel personally responsible for the lives and welfare of their employes. It is a personal and local rather than a social sense of responsibility, the kind of nobility that obliges a man to attend so singly and conscientiously to his own business that he never relates it to the general good. Just as the old type of planter sees no choice but to "look after" his croppers in hard times, so undoubtedly many Southern mills are kept going at a loss because the local owners are heavily aware that they rule a wholly dependent community.

There is no consistency in the exhibit. Factories working only three or four days a week cling to the ten and eleven hour day. All through the depression you see mills blazing at night, going full tilt on a twenty-four hour schedule. Of two establishments engaged in exactly the same kind of work, one may be running to full capacity and the other on a half-time basis, carrying the idle operatives to the extent of free rent and credit at the company store. Here is an industry which, like the crop, employs more women and children than any other in the United States, works longer hours, runs night and day, constantly improves its machinery and is now engaged in speeding up unit production by means of the much advertised "stretch-out." Who could imagine that its trouble is overproduction? Any observer ignorant of the facts would conclude that it was feverishly catching up with a demand beyond its ordinary capacity to supply.

Cotton is the most speculative of crops and the most speculative of industries. It is subject to fluctuations of price so violent that the grower can never plan ahead, and to a marketing system so disorganized that the manufacturer gyrates between rush orders and lulls. The Southern farmer is by tradition and temperament even less a cooperator than other farmers. Recent efforts of the Federal Farm Board to force him into cooperatives and "peg" the market have met a lukewarm and doubtful support from the planters themselves, and an opposition extending from the brokers to the country storekeeper whose currency is cotton. The factories on their side maintain the same kind of "independence" as the plantations.

Cotton is the biggest of the unmerged and uncoordinated industries. It is a lawless tangle of small, single-process and unorganized units, all knotted together and pulling apart. A whole hierarchy of middlemen intervenes between buyer and seller. One set of merchants sells the yarn to the weavers, another the "gray goods" to the finishers, another the finished fabric to the wholesalers and commission men, and so on in an endless chain. A costly chain of vicious circles, resulting in a hand-to-mouth purchase system and a wild undercutting of prices on the part of small mills bent on keeping going on any terms. The entrepreneurs control the markets and are themselves subject to the incalculable mutations of fashion, which nowadays hit the pattern of bed-ticking as well as the sheen of stockings. Cotton is king, but his kingdom is anarchy.

If from this picture it appears that the migration of the textile mills only burdens the South with a sick industry in addition to a sick crop, it should be added that not a fact suggested in this oversimplified summary is not hammered home in every cotton-growing State. The best minds of the South are fully alive to their basic problem; too well they realize that on this shifting foundation they have to build a new economic structure. It is the rest of the country, reading of a textile strike in Gastonia or meeting migrants from the cotton fields in the bread lines of Northern towns, which fails to recognize that these are not symptoms that can be cured singly or diagnosed at all without a knowledge of organic conditions—heredity, environment, the full case history. My own impression is that the new South is up against a problem as difficult as any in modern civilization. In a world of painful adjustments, none requires more genius than the integration into a new economy, itself experimental, of the whole intricate and archaic complex of cotton, from its roots in the Black Belt to its final flowering in 1930 chintz.

THE greatest authority on the subject I have met assured me wearily that no one understands the cotton system; it involves the three great unknown quantities—nature, human nature and the nature of modern industry. To those mysteries might be added a fourth, the capital X represented by the imponderable resistance of the plant itself. The defenders of Vicksburg deflected the Yankee bullets with natural fortifications capped by cotton bales. That long siege I used to think of as another proof of the hopeless courage of the South. Since making this survey, it seems to me no less a proof of the impervious density of cotton against all manner of attack.

Compared to the trigonometric problem of organizing the cotton system, working out a steel combination is no more than a sum in simple addition. Beyond such simple factors as Wall Street, power companies and tariffs, it includes the race problem, the land problem, local patriotism, folk ways that are as potent in captains of industry as in hill billies, the terrible habit of poverty, the chaos of individualist industry. Primarily the problem of the South, because this section has now the monopoly of the textile processes, it is not confined to this section or this country. France and Belgium are also in a textile slump. One by one the looms shut down in Lancashire, where the average wage of the workers is now reduced to 25 shillings a week. And Russia recently offered to deliver in England finished cotton at 20 per cent below the market price. Cotton is perhaps the most spectacular example of a world industry at the mercy of economic forces it can neither understand nor control.

Is the South doing anything about it? The weevil has done his best to reduce the acreage, but not enough, and growing cotton to feed bugs is not exactly an economic solution. In every Southern State there is an echo of the vigorous "Live-at-Home" campaign of Governor Gardner of North Carolina, a crusade to educate the South to grow its own foodstuffs. The movement for diversification—"Away from Cotton!"—makes some headway. The greatest obstacle, apart from the cotton habit, is the policy of the banks in refusing to lend money to the planters and small landowners on any other crop. The money lenders have been abetted by the fertilizer producers, for whom no plant creates the steady business that cotton does.

Now the contrary tendency begins to assert itself. A few long-sighted country bankers refuse to make loans unless cotton is accompanied by fodder and food crops. Most important of all is the first advance of machinery on the plant that has most stubbornly resisted change and mechanization. One shudders to contemplate the effect of this change on croppers and tenants, but it will inevitably drive them from the land and alter the whole economy of the rural South.

The textile industry is agitated and on the defensive as it has never been. Everywhere the most intelligent and successful manufacturers are insisting on reform in their own ranks. Among the dozens of mill owners and managers I met, all but two were convinced that the eight-hour day is coming in the cotton mills. Invariably they protested, as fervently as the powers at a disarmanent conference, that they would accept any policy of reduction, cooperation or wage rates to which all the others would subscribe.

THE most hopeful phase of the situation is the frankness with which the leaders of the industry are facing the facts. The most radical discussions of the cotton problem take place at meetings of manufacturers. No one has agitated for reorganization and reform more strongly than Henry P. Kendall, owner of large mills in New England and the Carolinas. At a recent meeting of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers in Boston, he described cotton as the only business that had not learned the lesson of the new age.

"The textile industry," he said, "has been tried in the court of public opinion and found guilty of habitual disobedience to the laws of economics and common sense." At the same meeting, Eben Whitman, vice president of the William Whitman Company, denounced exploitation of women and children as a prime cause of "the downfall of this great and essential industry," and declared that the time had arrived when feelings had to be hurt if the situation is to be saved.

His demand for a voluntary rather than a forced survey was endorsed in an equally vigorous speech by Donald Comer of the Avondale Mills of Birmingham. Bernard M. Cone, president of the Cone Mills at Greensboro, is another among the large manufacturers who recognize that the whole system has to be modernized. It cannot be overemphasized that men like these are the only ones who know enough about cotton to deal with the problem. It has to be viewed not from this narrow angle or that but whole, as the many-tentacled octopus that it is.

Part of the present trouble is that it is changing. It is in the deep trough of a vast and buoyant wave. Far from being discouraging, that upheaval is as hopeful a sign in the land of cotton as the first rows of Spring green in the plantation. It represents the painful travail of rebirth.

More coercive to cotton than any other force is the spread of new industries. In the South are to be found the largest number of "doubling cities' revealed by the new census. Here is the advance sector of the push toward the larger towns which is more characteristic of the past decade than the growth of the great cities. In the South a doubling town is a town that has acquired a factory. It means a profound modification of the plantation system as the slack of the cotton fields is taken up by industry and trade. It means also that as other industries compete for labor, the textile industry must change its standards. If only it meant besides that Southern industry, past this present stage of domestication, might develop into something like the deliverer it appears to the eager country folk waiting for jobs at all the factory doors.

With its fine tradition of responsibility, under these happy skies, the young South has a thrilling opportunity. Beginning at this late stage, profiting by the mistakes of the industrial pioneers, it could build on its monopoly a cotton civilization that might illustrate at last what civilized industry could be. Then there would be something to write about the Romance of Cotton!

ONE YEAR OF RULE BY LABOR IN BRITAIN

Sir Philip Gibbs Says Premier MacDonald Has Built Up a Reputation That Puts Him High on the Honor Roll

By Sir PHILIP GIBBS

THE signing of the naval treaty, for which Ramsay MacDonald, the British Premier, gets a fair share of credit, and the passing of a budget imposing new taxation upon the British people give one an opportunity of summing up the record of the British Labor Government.

Before the election which brought this new government into power—though power strictly limited by any combination against it between Conservatives and Liberals—I prophesied in THE NEW YORK TIMES MAGAZINE that if Labor should be returned there would be no danger of any revolutionary action by Mr. MacDonald and his colleagues and that they would be as traditional in their methods as their political opponents. This has now been fully proved, although the increase of taxation is continuing a process by which the social conditions of Great Britain are being radically changed.

Ramsay MacDonald himself is steadily building up a reputation which already marks him out as one of Britain's most remarkable Prime Ministers in the long roll-call of history. He has succeeded in living down the intense unpopularity—to put it mildly—which came to him because of his pacifist attitude during the war and the deep suspicion in the minds of his political enemies that he was unpatriotic, in secret collusion with bolshevism and a dangerous demagogue who would undermine the foundations of Britain's security and social structure. Now even the Conservatives are satisfied that he is no more pernicious than any one who is not a Conservative, and many of them, including Mr. Stanley Baldwin, whom he succeeded in the Premiership, admire him and respect him not only for recent acts of statesmanship but for personal qualities of an attractive and even endearing kind.

HIS own Radical wing, led by a man named Maxton with a lock of black hair falling over a cadaverous face with deep-set eyes—the very caricature of a revolutionary leader—accuse Mr. MacDonald of being false to his old principles as a Socialist and almost "Victorian" in his defense of capital, imperialism, social snobbishness and ancient tradition. My own view is that Mr. Maxton and his rebels are right in calling their leader a traditionalist and Victorian. Instinctively he is and always has been (as his early writings reveal) hostile to revolutionary action or short cuts to the social millennium. He believes in gradual evolution. But in his bones he is even more old-fashioned than that. He is—though he would hate to admit it—a romantic and sentimentalist of the old school.

His country's past speaks to him. He loves its old stones, its pageantry, its romantic memories, its heroic story. He is not repelled by ceremonial uniforms or the splendor of a royal levée, or the beauty of a cathedral service. He likes them. His favorite novelist is Sir Walter Scott—not read nowadays by the younger crowd. He is not a "Little Englander," but has a pride in the commonwealth of nations which make up the British Empire. He believes in the old moralities and is moved to real emotion by the virtues of self-sacrifice and devotion to ideals which are somewhat scoffed at by the young Radicals of "advanced" views.

I heard him make a very eloquent and even beautiful speech not many weeks ago in praise of a lady who had devoted her life to the service of suffering childhood. He spoke with the utmost sincerity as one could see, and he revealed himself—as he often does—as a man with a deep well of tenderness in his character. Not of such stuff does one make the ruthless politician, cruel for the sake of some abstract theory of "liberty" or "equality." The weakness of Britain's present Prime Minister is that he is inclined to be over-emotional and that his speeches always have the throb of the high ideal in the undertones of his voice. Matter-of-fact men get a little tired of that continual appeal to humanity's noble aspirations. They would prefer sixpence off the income tax.

Some little time ago Mr. MacDonald resigned his membership in the Independent Labor party. That was a very significant action which has considerable political importance.

The I. L. P., as it is called by its devotees, was the intellectual G. H. Q. of the Labor party in Great Britain. It was until recent days the inner conclave which kept pure the gospel of "Socialism in Our Time", and dictated to Labor members of Parliament the principles and methods by which they were expected to enforce that faith at Westminster. Its power and influence were considerable when Labor was in opposition. But the situation was altered when the Labor party formed a government. Men like Mr. MacDonald and Philip Snowden regarded themselves loyally as members of a national government representing all classes and not as delegates of a party acting merely in the interests of their own class. They refused to be dictated to by a political organization outside the House of Commons and not elected by the whole people. They demanded complete liberty of action.

But the split with the I. L. P. went deeper than that. It became a question of principles and political faith. The I. L. P. demands the immediate socialization of England. Mr. MacDonald and his Ministers have departed from the impatient enthusiasms of youth. They believe now that the ideal of absolute social equality would drag Great Britain to ruin and disaster if enforced by rapid and drastic measures. They have therefore broken with the Independent Labor party which in turn has denounced them as heretics to their former faith. Mr. Maxton, thrusting back his black lock and flashing fire from his sunken eyes, threatens open rebellion against his chief in the division lobby of the House of Commons, where he has thirty hot heads under his leadership. An adverse vote from this thirty would defeat the government unless the Liberals came to its rescue, as they are certain to do.

Mr. MacDonald's personality is very dominant, in spite of that emotionalism to which I have alluded. He has a natural dignity which makes his followers afraid of him and ensures the respect of the entire House of Commons, where he is not seen as often as the rank and file would like, owing to his absorption in foreign affairs and the official duties of Premiership. He has a perfect command of parliamentary etiquette and tradition, unlike many of the raw recruits. His handsome face and an easy eloquence, distinguished by his Scottish accent and fine musical voice, do not reveal the "self-made man." He has a natural grace and even elegance of manner which suggest the aristocrat rather than the peasant stock from which he comes.

Not the "hail-fellow-well-met" type of man, even with a touch of haughtiness at times, he is nevertheless charming and sympathetic to all who treat him with respect, and there is an inner sweetness and simplicity in the man which shines out when he is pleased with himself and the world. He has his black moods, I am told, and his reserves of melancholy like all of Celtic blood. One cannot understand Ramsay MacDonald without emphasizing his Highland ancestry, making him always a little foreign to English minds. His handling of the Naval Conference in London showed him at his best—infinitely patient, wonderfully courteous, admirable in his dignity, his straightforwardness, his painstaking endeavors to remove difficulties. I believe that he gained the real admiration of all the delegates.
